LAST NIGHT'S FIGHTS

Pittsfield, Mass. (AP) — Harold Johnson, 182, Philadelphia, stopped Johnny York, 206, Morristown, Pa., (6).

BLACKWOOD on BRIDGE

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

As usual, it was the defenders' second lead—not their first—that was the crucial play in today's deal. Miss Brash led her fourth best club, the five, and Mr. Masters won with the ace, felling the lone king. This was purely routine, but the lead at trick two was of vital importance.

The safe return, the easy return, was the queen of clubs. Many players would make that return without thought. It cannot fool your partner. It cannot "lose" anything.

It is also true, however, that it cannot set the contract.

Mr. Masters did not return the queen of clubs. He thought a few moments and then chose a lead which looked extremely dangerous, but was the only lead to beat the hand.

Here was his reasoning. If Miss Brash had a sure spade winner and the ace of diamonds, the defenders would win four tricks automatically — one trick in each suit. But it was very unlikely that she had both of these winners.

Mr. Champion

On the other hand, it was fairly likely that she had one or the other. If so, there was a chance for success but it would be necessary to win two heart tricks and those heart tricks had to be won before Mr. Champion had an opportunity to pick up the outstanding trumps and set dummy's diamond suit.

Mr. Masters figured the hand could be set if Miss Brash had either of the winners named above, plus the queen of hearts. His lead, then, at the second trick was the deuce of hearts.

Miss Brash played her queen and Mr. Champion had no better play than to win with dummy's king.

He sensed the true situation and, in an effort to shut out Miss Brash in case she held the lone king of trumps, he refused the spade finesse and went up with the ace. He could afford to lose the king of spades in Mr. Masters' hand because dummy's guarded jack of hearts would hold the losers in that suit to one.

But it was no good. Miss Barsh won the second spade and her heart return through dummy's jack up to Mr. Masters' ace-10 put the contract down one.

GARDENING DRILL

Carolyn Shaw, and James Novak of Brooklyn, N.Y., busily mark vegetable garden border at the Brooklyn Botanic Garden.

Children's garden, now in its 45th year, draws nearly 400 boys and girls annually. 1958 harvest totaled about nine tons, valued at over $2,000. Most popular vegetables were corn (1,000 ears), lettuce (one ton), tomatoes (3,000 lbs.) and radishes (over 45,000 roots). The children also planted a flower border over 400 feet long, containing many varieties of annuals.

For only $3 a season, each participating child receives use of the land, seed, supplies and instruction. All produce remains their property.

Communities which start children's gardens on vacant land or little used park property will provide youngsters with useful activity, new learning and help combat juvenile delinquency before it starts, according to the National Garden Bureau.
