Blackwood on BRIDGE
By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

Some bids made after the first round are forcing although they do not involve a jump or the mentioning of a new suit by a responder. They can be correctly considered as forcing because of what the bidder did or failed to do earlier in the auction. Take Mr. Masters' three diamond call in today's deal, for example.

Mr. Dale opened the bidding with one diamond, properly judging his hand as too strong for a one no trump opening. Mr. Masters made the obvious response of one spade.

Mr. Dale's next bid was two no trump—not an absolute force, but a bid which is practically never passed. It asked Mr. Masters to go if he held as much as two kings or the equivalent.

Mr. Masters

Now Mr. Masters sensed the possibility of a slam as his own hand was about the equivalent of an opening bid. He wasn't willing to jump straight to six and he cast about for some way to find out more about his partner's holding. He came up with a bid of three diamonds.

Mr. Dale could not possibly read this as anything but a go-ahead bid. The reason was that if Mr. Masters had diamond support and a weak hand, he would have bid two diamonds on the first round. Since he had not done so but instead had been willing to bid spades and then (apparently) raise diamonds, he must have a pretty fair hand.

Mr. Dale showed his good spade support and from there the bidding progressed swiftly to a slam.

Mr. Masters was fortunate enough to get the jack of clubs opening and he won with the king. His problem was to do something about his two heart losers and the key play in the diamond suit.

He could cash the king of diamonds, then finesse the jack. Or he could cash the king and ace, then ruff a third round, hoping the queen would drop.

However, with the club lead he had time to make a play which improved his chances to about 4 to 1 in favor of success. After taking three rounds of trumps, he led a small diamond from dummy and finessed the nine when Mrs. Keen played low.

This play would win if Mrs. Keen had the ten or if either defender held the queen, guarded not more than twice. When the nine won, Mr. Masters took all the tricks as he was able to ditch both of his losing hearts on dummy's ace and jack of diamonds.
