FAMOUS FOR VICE — Often referred to as "London's square mile of vice", Soho is the most cosmopolitan and colorful section of the city. Besides its well-known strip-tease establishments and prostitutes, Soho is famous for its restaurants, small cluttered shops and continental atmosphere. This is a view of crowded Frith Street in Soho, one of London's top tourist attractions. — CP Photo

Opening lead: Ace of ♠

A shrewd appraisal of an opponent's psychology netted a top score to an enterprising declarer in today's hand taken from a recent tournament.

Although the cards presented no sound play for the contract of five diamonds, most of the North-South pairs arrived at the minor suit game. The ace of spades was opened and the suit continued. It will be seen that a club shift would have put an end to declarer's aspirations. However, West's holding did not make such a lead appear inviting, and in no case was this shift made. At this point several of the declarers, having been given a new lease on life, attempted to bring in the hand by discarding a club. They cashed the ace and king of hearts, crossed to dummy with the club ace and led the queen of hearts, shedding a low club. Unfortunately, West ruffed and the contract went on the rocks.

One declarer chose a different line of attack. He took a dim view of the chances that the hearts would break 3-3, which is much against the odds, and preferred to place his reliance on human frailty. That West held a combination in clubs from which he was reluctant to lead was apparent from the fact that he did not shift at once. If he is given the diamond ace he may still continue to act under the same inhibition. So a trump was led. West won and continued with a spade, and declarer had no difficulty in running off with the rest of the tricks.

The merits of West's defence are not at the moment under discussion, though from this corner it does seem to have been lacking in inspiration. We have the feeling, however, that South earned his chips by a shrewd forecast of what West's reaction would be.
