and another. Fish and waterpower, on many rivers, seem to clash head-on. A dam on the Fraser River would produce enormous amounts of power, but it would change the conditions of the water—temperature, oxygen, rate of flow—far beyond the narrow tolerances of the fish, and (even if a way could be found to get the fish past the dams) would damage most of the runs past repair.

(On the Columbia, the damage has already been done. On the Peace, there are no fish runs of importance.)

Chopping down a forest for lumber may bring immediate cash returns, but keeping it as a park may give refreshment and delight to the eye for generations; and yet if a stand of timber remains too long past its prime, it begins to deteriorate.

A conservation authority must balance several sets of values, present and future, tangible and intangible. The resources conference has evolved a formula called "multiple use, with priorities."

Service act for review

OTTAWA (CP) — Third and final reading was scheduled to be given today in the Commons to a new Civil Service Act, affecting some 135,000 federal employees across Canada.

The act, representing the first major overhaul of civil service legislation since 1938, sailed through clause-by-clause study Tuesday night in committee of the whole House. It had already been given second reading—approval in principle.

Tuesday's sitting also saw the Commons pass amendments to the National Housing Act providing more loan money for housing, sewage projects and university residences, and put the final stamp of approval on a bill setting up the machinery for planning Canadian centennial celebrations in 1967.
