Blackwood on BRIDGE

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

It's wonderful what you can come up with in defending against three no trump if you will determine at the start how much strength your partner can have.

This you can do with reasonable accuracy by adding the actual high card points in your own hand and dummy to the estimated points in declarer's hand.

Deduct the total from 40 (the maximum number of points in the deck) and the remainder will be what your partner has.

In today's deal Mr. Meek had 14 points, dummy had 13 and Mr. Abel's bid of two no trump promised 13. That made a total of 40, so Mr. Dale could not have a face card.

Mr. Abel

Mr. Meek used this simple calculation to good advantage to beat this contract. His partner's opening lead was the deuce of spades, which puzzled Mr. Meek at first, but which eventually provided the key to the killing defense.

This is why the lead was puzzling: Mr. Dale could not hold any high cards and with such a hand he is known to lead from a short suit, a two or three card holding, in an effort to hit his partner's long suit.

Why had he not done so in this case? He had led the deuce of spades which indicated a four card holding in that suit.

The answer appeared to be that he did not have a short suit except in diamonds, which was the only suit his opponents had bid and which would therefore look hopeless to him.

On this reasoning, it seemed logical to assume that his distribution was 4-4-4-1, including a singleton diamond.

If this was correct, then of course he had four hearts and, carrying the thought to its ultimate conclusion, Mr. Abel had only two hearts.

After winning the first trick with the ace of spades, Mr. Meek did not make the thoughtless return of a spade in the forlorn hope that his partner had a suit headed by king, queen or both.

Instead he laid down the ace of hearts and followed with the queen. This effectively trapped Mr. Abel's doubleton jack.

Dummy's king won the second heart and Mr. Abel came to his hand with a spade and tried the diamond finesse. That lost to the king and the defenders cashed two more heart tricks to put the hand down one.
