The bidding:

Opening lead: Queen of ♦

While it is very important, even to the expert, to have at his quick command the proper handling of various card combinations, nevertheless there are certain situations which must be improvised during the actual combat. In today's hand, declarer had an opportunity to work out one such problem, but unfortunately failed to rise to the occasion.

West opened the bidding with one heart and, when the next two players passed, South decided, I think quite properly, to take a chance on a game contract in spades. He reasoned that if he found his partner with insufficient values, the sting would be mellowed by his possession of 150 honors. West opened the queen of diamonds, and East won with the ace to return the suit, which of course declarer took with his king. South drew two rounds of trumps and led the king of hearts. West won with the ace and returned a small heart. Declarer, mindful of the opening bid, decided to play West for the jack of hearts and, in order to provide a parking place for one of his clubs, he inserted the ten from dummy. East, of course, won with the jack and the club return settled declarer's hash.

I must admit that the declarer was the victim of a little hard luck but, on the other hand, he contributed to his own downfall. It must be agreed that it is not unreasonable to assume that West held the jack of hearts, but a more effective method of playing the hand was available to declarer.

After extracting trumps, he should merely lead the seven of hearts from his hand. West will be forced to duck to prevent the establishment of two heart tricks for declarer. So, South goes up with the queen of hearts in dummy and returns a heart to force out the ace. True, it is a matter of mere chance that the jack of hearts drops on this trick but, even had that card not appeared, West would be in without any safe method of getting out. He finds himself in an old fashioned end play. He has the doubtful choice of leading a third round of hearts, which will establish dummy's ten, or else he must lead a club, which takes the curse out of that suit for declarer.
