Squabble over ice at Winter Olympics

SQUAW VALLEY, Calif. (CP)—The hockey tournament of the eighth winter Olympics is back on today, with only a couple of points still in dispute.

With the Games due to start Thursday, a threat by the International Ice Hockey Federation to pull its teams out of the Olympics because of a squabble over the number of playing days melted like the ice on the rinks Tuesday night when IIHF officials finally sat down with directors of the Olympics.

After three hours they emerged and said they had reached full understanding.

RUSSIA-CANADA MATCH

Among other points settled was setting up a game between Canada and Russia, favorites for the tournament's gold medal, Sunday February 28—the final day of the Games.

To meet this schedule, both countries will have to win through an earlier elimination series.

The other points still causing friction in the hockey camps are the lack of proper practice opportunities and the condition of the ice surfaces.

Ernie Goman, manager of Canada's Kitchener - Waterloo team, joined the international protests that have arisen over the allotment of practice time when his team arrived at the rink for a workout Tuesday and found Russian figure skaters firmly entrenched.

"This is the first time we've had a chance to practise on the indoor rink and everything's loused up," he complained.

"The figure skaters have had this arena in the mornings and nights. After all, we're interested in testing the boards and corners before the tournament starts."

Jack Riley, coach of the U.S. team, said six different teams showed up to practise at the same time Tuesday morning.

The clamor over the ice conditions was even louder.

"BARNYARD"

Goman described the rinks as "barnyard."

"We've got better rinks in many small villages in Canada," he said. "When you bring a team to the best amateur hockey competition in the world you expect better conditions."

The ice is so bad it could upset the play of a team, especially one that relies heavily on passing, Goman indicated.

Eduard Farda, coach of the highly rated Czech team, called the rinks "atrocious." What is worse, he said, Olympic officials are doing little to improve the situation.

BLACKWOOD on BRIDGE

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

When your opponents get to a contract of three no trump in the manner shown today, it is a pretty good guess that they have about 26 high card points in their combined hands.

If they have just 26, that leaves your side with 14. Substract what you have from 14 and that will give you are fairly accurate preliminary estimate of your partner's high card strength.

Then look at the dummy to see if it contains any surplus values. If so, reduce your estimate of partner's strength by the amount of that excess.

This kind of thinking can be of inestimable value in defending against no trump contracts.

Mr. Dale, who had five points, made a preliminary estimate that his partner had about nine. He led the jack of diamonds and when the dummy came down showing no excess values, but just enough to raise one no trump to three, he mentally confirmed his estimate of eight or nine points in Mr. Masters' hand.

Mr. Champion won the first trick with the ace of diamonds, led the jack of clubs and took the finesse. Mr. Masters won with the queen.

Now Mr. Masters had been doing some estimating of his own.

With nine points in his own hand, he figured his partner for not more than five.

Partner had played the jack of diamonds, which accounted for one point.

Mr. Champion's play of the clubs made it pretty clear that Mr. Dale's other points were represented by the ace of clubs.

If Mr. Champion had that card, surely he would have laid it down before taking a club finesse that might have lost to a lone queen.

So Mr. Masters abandoned the idea that his partner had led from a diamond holding headed by K J 10.

Instead of returning his partner's original lead, he switched to the deuce of spades.

Dummy's nine won. Mr. Champion had no chance for nine tricks without developing at least one club and when Mr. Dale got in with the ace of that suit he returned a spade through dummy's king and Mr. Masters collected three spade tricks to break the contract.
