BLACKWOOD on BRIDGE

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

Mr. Dale was playing the people as well as the cards when he jumped to two no trump on the South hand. None of the textbooks would show his holding as an illustration of such a strong bid opposite a partner who had not bid freely. But when he has Mr. Meek for a partner he sometimes takes heroic measures to pry him loose.

There were some elements of safety in the bid. Mr. Abel had passed as dealer and had taken no action at his second turn to bid. Although Mrs. Keen had opened the bidding, she had not contested the issue further, lending credence to the thought that she had opened a minimum.

From this evidence it appeared that Mr. Meek had a little strength somewhere. The question was, would he take action if Mr. Dale bid only one no trump? Mr. Dale thought not—and he was probably right.

Mrs. Keen

It took an unusual sort of holdup play to bring in nine tricks. Mr. Abel led the six of clubs, the four went on from dummy and Mrs. Keen played the king. Mr. Dale almost had the ace out of his hand, when he decided to stop and think a moment.

Playing the ace would automatically give him two tricks in clubs. But was that the whole story? Mrs. Keen surely had both of the missing aces to justify her opening bid. And both of these aces had to be knocked out before nine tricks could be accumulated.

If Mr. Abel had five clubs and Mrs. Keen three, a reasonable and frequent distribution, there was real danger in winning the first trick. When Mrs. Keen got in with one of her aces, she would return a club and Mr. Abel, unless he were sound asleep, would let Mr. Dale win that trick.

When Mrs. Keen got in with her other ace, a third club lead would let Mr. Abel win three tricks in the suit to break the contract. So Mr. Dale elected to pass up the doubtful advantage of winning two club tricks in the interests of taking nine tricks in all.

He let the king win the first trick. He also ducked the second club. He won the third—and then had plenty of time to knock out Mrs. Keen's aces and make his game.
