SURVEY BOAT AUDWIN STRUCK MASSETT BAR

Crew Went Ashore in Skiff but Boat Thought to be Total Loss

The Ketchikan Chronicle of Friday last says:

The U.S. Coast and Geodetic Survey boat Audwin struck a bar at Massett Harbor at Graham Island last Sunday night at 10 o'clock, and is believed to be practically a total loss. The crew succeeded in getting to shore in a skiff and in saving the records as well as most of the instruments used by them in their work as a precise triangulation party.

The Audwin is well known around Ketchikan, being in the use of the service for some time. She is a 65-foot boat, with a 11 foot beam. The place is unprotected from the northwest winds, and as a result at the time there was a very heavy sea running, according to members of the crew who were brought to Ketchikan on the Buckeye this morning.

Lieut. Jack Senior was in charge of the boat, and at the time was on Mt. Lazaro on Duke Island, observing. Lieut. James Downey, in charge of the chartered boat Buckeye, was at Tow Hill on Graham Island at the time, some 20 miles east of Massett Harbor, and due to the lines of communication being down he did not learn of the accident until Tuesday.

Unable to Help

At the time the Audwin was coming in from Dixon's Entrance and the storm had caused such a sea as to force cannery tenders on the island to stay in the harbor. When the boat struck the bar the tender Waterfall and the Buckeye endeavored to help as they could, but were not able to do much, the Waterfall going on the bar itself, although no damage was done and she was later floated.

Upon reaching Lieut. Downey, the Buckeye took the members of the crew on board, excepting Ensign W. H. Bainbridge, who is still at Massett Harbor, awaiting the return of the Buckeye. The latter boat proceeded to Duke Island to inform Lieut. Senior, who had become worried over the delay of the boat, flagged a seine boat and arrived in Ketchikan last night, searching for the Audwin. Leaving here before the arrival of the Buckeye this morning he is still ignorant of the disaster and is conducting a search for the boat.

The members of the crew of the Audwin who were on board are C. J. Olson, Russell Radenbaugh and C. B. Ellis, as well as Ensign Bainbridge.

The Government teleghaphs were out of business for a time today while the system was being connected with the C.N.R. between Hazelton and Haysport.
