LAST LINGERING RELICS OF THE DAYS OF THE BUFFALO ARE SOLD ON THE PRAIRIE

The world's last shipment of buffalo horns was sent from Winnipeg to Ottawa recently by the Indian Curio Company, Main and James streets. It consisted of 10,000 horns and was worth about $5,000 wholesale. In the Dominion capital the horns will be "made over" into their future shapes as hat racks, gun racks, drinking cups and souvenirs of all kinds.

Last of Great Store.
Barring 500 horns which still remain in the possession of the local curio company, this shipment does away with the last of a store of about 30,000 of the headgear of the former proud masters of the prairie. The collecting of this stock is closely connected with the early history of Winnipeg. The horns were picked up on the prairies by the settlers and Indians. If the brave warriors could have thrown a glance into the future when they, after killing the buffaloes, rode away with only the skin, the tongue and the heart, leaving the rest of the carcass to the tender mercies of the elements, and then seen that they a few years later would be walking around digging the half buried horns up from the ground to sell them to the palefaces, they no doubt would have shown more care in disposing of them.

The man who bought the buffalo horns from the Indians and the settlers was the late W. F. White, first a blacksmith in the service of the C. P. R., and later a curio dealer on Main street, and here is where the similarity of the early history of Winnipeg and that of the stock of buffalo horns comes in. The growth of the new and prospering town kept exact pace with the growth of the horn stock. For every new arrival in Winnipeg, as it were, either in ox carts via the trails from south and east, or boat, or in the time honored way of simply being born, for every such

DON'T TALK "GOO-GOO" TALK TO BABIES: EVEN THE TINIEST CAN UNDERSTAND COMMON SENSE

The use of the words, "cute," "cunning" and "old fashioned" as applied to children, although they are hoary with antiquity, are serious evidences of the existence of a real evil. It is of great importance to the development of a child that it should be surrounded with everything that is helpful, and modern science is laying especial stress on the help that lies in the expectation of good things. It is a common thing to hear the parent or other relative of a fairly intelligent child quoting as a "funny story" some sentence of the child's in which he or she has used a long word, although the word may have been rightly used.

As many such stories are told before the children themselves this fatal error has two dangers, either that the child may become conceited and desirous of showing off, in which case it will get hold of all the long words possible and use them whether they have any meaning or not; or else, that the child will fail to develop the use of proper words for fear of being laughed at. It is not right to laugh at a child at any time, but to laugh at a child for doing right is so obvious an injustice that it is a wonder it continues at all.

Closely allied with this is the mistake of speaking to children in a way far less grammatical than grown-up people would consider possible among themselves. At the very time that it is important that a child should learn the balance of phrases and the use of the right word in the right place, careless mothers and fathers will permit utter carelessness of speech and even the use of "baby talk," which is a crime in a child's upbringing. There is no reason to expect a child to speak ungrammatically!

A child does not learn speech through grammar, but scores of cultured people to whom a grammatical slip is impossible who know absolutely nothing of formal grammar. Many of the writers who are distinguished for good literary style have no memory of the exact definitions that occur in parsing and analysis.

Children say enough really witty things without spoiling all their ideas about speech by laughing before them at every sign of their advancement. A misplaced word may be laughed at if the relation of the sentence is ludicrous, but the reason should be shown to the child in order that the word may be used rightly the next time; under no circumstances, however, should a child be permitted to hear its fair development being treated as a joke.

FIVE ROYAL BABY BOYS AND GIRLS

arrival Mr. White bought a new set of horns.

The race between the town and the horns was neck and neck, until the latter numbered about 32,000. The railroads then made the competition less equal, and then there were no more horns to gather on the prairies, at any rate not in sufficient numbers to make it worth while for even the squaws.

Sold and Stolen Back.

This horn trade with the dusky braves was not without trouble and inconvenience. The original lords of the western plains were not exactly famous for their honesty. They would come in large numbers to Mr. White's store and, one at a time, bargain with him for the sale of their pickings, or rather those of their wives. The horns were usually wrapped up in bundles looking very much alike, and when Mr. White had bought one, he usually throw it out in the back yard and then turn to the next customer. The one who had disposed of his bag then took a stroll around to said back yard and if nobody was watching he simply helped himself to the very same bundle and sold it to Mr. White again.

On a successful day the Indians thus made good profits and the dispensers of fire water, who in the good old days were not subject to such strict rules as in this writing, did a rushing business as long as the Indians' money lasted, and then the trouble began. The braves put on their war paint and went on a high old spree. It would often require more than the local constabulary to persuade them to leave town.

As stated before, this shipment to Ottawa does away with the last big store of buffalo horns in the west. There is no more supply to pick from. The only place where a few well preserved horns still may be found is around Medicine Hat, Alta., but the supply there is hardly sufficient to satisfy the local demand from tourists.

TWO FIRE WARDENS VISITED

Mr. W. C. Gladwin, chief supervisor of firewardens, of Vancouver, and Clyde Leavitt, chief fire inspector of Ottawa, came here from the south on the last trip of the George, and was met by Mr. Geo. A. Kerr, divisional fire warden for the Skeena river division, who accompanied them as far as Hazelton, returning again on Thursday evening. Mr. Gladwin, who was here three years ago when interviewed, said he would not believe if he had not seen for himself what Prince Rupert had accomplished in the past two years.

Both gentlemen enjoyed their trip very much and are greatly pleased with the manner in which the Grand Trunk people are clearing up and keeping clean their right-of-way, and the desire on the part of the chief officials to co-operate in every way possible with the government for the suppression of fire along their line.

Mr. Gladwin and Mr. Leavitt left again for Victoria yesterday morning and Mr. Kerr will return to Kitselas tomorrow.
