BLACKWOOD on BRIDGE

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

Can you spot the flaw in Miss Brash's play which cost her the contract in today's deal? The opening spade lead was won by Mr. Dale with the king and Miss Brash dropped the ten.

Back came the seven of spades and Mrs. Keen elected to play low and let the queen win. She was afraid her king of diamonds was not a quick enough entry. She felt sure her partner had another spade left, so that if he could get in once more the balance of the spade suit could be run without further interruption.

After winning the second trick Miss Brash led a low heart to dummy's king, returned a club and finessed the queen. She then cashed the ace of clubs but the king failed to drop. Hoping for a miracle, she led another club.

Mr. Dale

Mr. Dale won this with the king, returned his last spade and his partner ran off three fast tricks in that suit to put the hand down one.

As is often the case, success depended up on a slight and apparently immaterial change in the play. After her unwarranted jump to three no trump, Miss Brash hardly deserved a chance for nine tricks but she had it just the same.

All she had to do was to play her queen of spades under the king at trick one. Now if Mrs. Keen ducked the second spade, as before, to preserve communication with her partner, the jack could be played from the board and that would be the vital second entry to dummy. Miss Brash could then take two club finesses instead of one, bringing in the entire suit without loss.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Dale could have fouled up this line of play by dropping a low spade on the first trick, forcing Miss Brash to win in her own hand and making sure that dummy would never have a spade entry.

But that was practically an impossible play for him to make against a bidder like Miss Brash. She might have been in there on something like ten-eight doubleton in spades, in which case he would be losing the opportunity of his side running the first five tricks.

Rocket on holiday

MONTREAL (CP) — Maurice (Rocket) Richard took an early holiday from Montreal Canadiens training camp Tuesday, announcing that he is going to Toronto for two days and that Bernard Geoffrion is still the man most likely to beat his 50-goal record.

The Rocket, to decide at camp whether he is fit for a 19th consecutive National Hockey League season, was going to Toronto on unspecified "personal business."

He expected to be back at camp Thursday.
