BLACKWOOD on BRIDGE

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

A small minority of good players would give an immediate spade raise with Mrs. Keen's hand, but most would refuse to go to the two level with the stodgy 4-3-3-3 distribution which could offer no ruffing values.

However, when Mr. Abel's rebids showed a very good hand and a strong desire to get to game in spite of Mrs. Keen's weakish notrump response, she was justified in going along with the idea.

Danger signals appeared from all sides during the play of the hand and Mr. Abel used the old bean to bring home ten tricks.

Mr. Abel

Mr. Masters won the opening diamond lead with the ace and returned the nine of diamonds to the king in the closed hand.

Mr. Abel laid down the ace of spades and the fall of the jack on his right was the first warning of possible trouble.

He abandoned trumps for the moment and led the ace of clubs, a low club to the king and a third club which he ruffed with a small spade.

The time had now come to do something about the heart suit. Mr. Abel thought back to the first two tricks. Mr. Masters had won with the ace of diamonds and returned the nine.

With four or more diamonds he would return his fourth highest. Obviously the nine could not be a fourth highest card.

Undoubtedly, then, he had started with either three diamonds or two. This assumption would give Mr. Dale either five or six diamonds.

The fall of the jack of spades on the first trump lead made it appear that Mr. Dale was also long in spades.

The evidence was strong that if anybody had a singleton heart, it was Mr. Dale.

Therefore Mr. Abel was careful to choose the ace for his first heart lead. He then led a low heart toward the king.

If Mr. Dale ruffed here, of course the small heart would be played from the board.

Mr. Abel could then control any return, pull trumps and win the king of hearts for his tenth trick.

So, Mr. Dale discarded a diamond and dummy's king of hearts won.

Now Mr. Abel ruffed a diamond with another low trump and the king and queen of trumps brought his total up to ten tricks.
