DEAD NIAGARA CENTRE SWEDEN

Falls There Roared Across Craggy Ridges for 9,000 Years Geologist Says

DUG IMMENSE CANYONS

Disappeared With Retreat of the Ice Northward 25,000 Years Ago

STOCKHOLM, Sweden, Mar. 1.—A former Swedish Niagara in the Swedish Midlands 25,000 years old and existing for 9,000 years, when the waters of the Baltic Sea, then without an outlet to the south, forced its way through a rocky barrier in the Swedish province of Nerke and pressed further on to the North Sea, is a startling discovery claimed by H. Munthe, a Swedish geologist, who has now completed his theoretical researches by a number of practical observations of the district in question.

According to Mr. Munthe's report the pressure of the ice, covering Scandinavia and great parts of the European continent, during the glacial period was so heavy that at its centre in Sweden the ground sank about 200 meters. As the ice melted and retreated towards the north the ground rose even higher than its present level about the sea, and thus blocked the southern outlet of the Baltic to the North Sea between Germany and Denmark. Across this ridge both the Stone Age people and animals and plants wandered into Sweden. As the ice continued to retreat the southern parts of Sweden also rose, but in the neighborhood of the present Swedish township of Degerfors in Nerke several deep ravines enabled the pent-up baltic Sea to find a new outlet. With tremendous force the icy waters of the Baltic widened these canyons, and here the Svea River was precipitated over the steep hills into the Let Rover valley, still in existence, then flowing down to the North Sea through the Lake of Venern. For 9,000 years these gigantic waterfalls roared across the craggy ridges in about twenty different channels, digging out canyons twenty-five meters deep, polished the edges of the rocks, shaped perpendicular cliffs, giant boulders, deep rock hollows and layers of cut glacier gravel that are now left to tell the tale of the pre-historic periods of the country.

The average height of this pre-historic Niagara is calculated to have been about sixty feet and its width over 2,000 feet, allowing a water flow of more than 6,000 cubic meters a second. This mighty spectacle was gradually reduced to nothing as the ice continued its retreat and the ground rose correspondingly. Meanwhile, the land ridge between Germany and Southern Sweden was broken through, and the Baltic once more recovered its old outlet until at last the North Sea invaded the then Danish mainland and created the island empire that is Denmark today.

The "dead falls" of Degerfors present a majestic aspect even today although the channel are dry, and trees and plants have grown in their gullies, thus enlivening the austere greyness of the rocks, once the bed of the giant river.

Similar "dead falls," dating, however, from later periods, are found elsewhere in Sweden, the most famous being those of Ragunda in the province of Aangermanland, which have become a real Mecca of international geologists.

SWEDEN HAD MUSIC EARLY

Pre-Historic Horns Recently Discovered Tell of Harmonies of 2,500 Years Ago

STOCKHOLM, Sweden, Mar. 1—Musical instruments, dating from the Bronze Age and found in Sweden's soil, prove that the rule of harmony and the different keys of music were known by the Swedes 2500 years ago, as proved by the research of Dr. Nihleu, a Stockholm archaologist, reported in an interesting article, just published. In certain localities those beautifully curved bronze horns are found lying together and when examined show that two horns always are mutually harmonized in C, D, F, or G, and that these were shaped in different curves so that two horns blown by players standing beside each other, together formed a rough circle. The archaeologists assume that the horns were used for religious rites as well as during battles. The horns musicians are often pictured in the numerous Bronze Age rock carvings in Sweden, where pre-historic artists tried to depict social and religious life in roughly hewn human figures.

Doctor Nihlen even assumes that many of the melodious Swedish folk-songs may trace their origin back to the Bronze Age and adds that the Vikings of later times were known to sing duets.

It has generally been assumed that the laws of harmony were discovered during the Middle Ages, since the Greeks and Romans do not seem to have known these principles of music. Thanks to the discoveries about the Swedish Bronze Age horns and bugles that have been practically tried out by present-day musicians, it is possible that northern influence has been brought to bear on Mediaeval church music.

The big bronze horns are ingeniously joined together by means of a quite modern-looking device so that one part of the horn was put on another and fastened by a bolt on the lower part that was thrust through a hole on the upper one. These horns, joined together in three different sections, like the safety pins found amongst the Bronze Age remains, give evidence of the inventive genius of the Bronze Age people in Sweden.

Among other pre-historic instruments found in the Swedish soil are bronze drums of excellent sound quality and an amber bridge used on a Viking time instrument with 4 or 6 strings, most probably the kind of small harp that was so popular during the migratory period of the Teuton tribes.

A. Deacon, until recently in charge of the Cape Lazo wireless station, arrived from the south yesterday to join the staff of the Digby Island station. He was accompanied north by Mrs. Deacon and child.
