Ore From Tropics Pauses At Kitimat On Way To World Aluminum Markets

By BRUCE LEVETT
Canadian Press Staff Writer

KITIMAT, B.C. (CP) — A metal found in the black soil of Jamaica and burned to powder in the smelters of British Guiana, pauses in wild northern British Columbia on its journey to world markets.

Here, day and night for a year now, a five-inch-wide stream of molten aluminum has poured into the moulds which spill out 40-pound ingots at the rate of 250 tons a day.

At the end of another year, the stream will be pouring out 500 tons daily.

ALL FOR EXPORT

A. C. Turney, works manager for the Aluminum Company of Canada, is the man who must see that the stream never stops.

"All of our product is exported," he says. "We ship about 50-50 by rail and sea to the western United States, with some going to Britain and Australia."

And his job is getting bigger.

At present, there are two potlines in operation — the long, black furnaces which turn white, powdery alumina into molten aluminum.

Three more are under construction and five more are scheduled to be started next year. Depending on the market for the light, strong metal, an ultimate 18 potlines are visualized along the two-mile smelter site.

COSMOPOLITAN FORCE

The aluminum begins as bauxite in Jamaica. From there, it goes to British Guiana for first refining into the powdered alumina. Deepsea freighters with holds like grain boats carry it to Kitimat, 400 miles north of Vancouver.

To bank the fires under this cosmopolitan metal, Mr. Turney has a cosmopolitan crew of 1,800 men, a force that is expected to number 2,100 within a year.

"About 50 per cent of the people in the plant have been in Canada less than three years," he says. "That holds generally throughout the area."

They live in temporary houses, trailers, motels, a hotel, apartment buildings and bunkhouses. They even live aboard a retired Sacramento river paddle-wheeler, rammed hard ashore in the shadow of the works.

ALL IN FOUR YEARS

It took four years of one-way traffic to put the Kitimat aluminum smelter into production.

There was nobody here in April, 1951, when 10 woodsmen stepped ashore and began clearing bush and making roads. The nearest people were the Kitimaat Indians in their village across the arm.

Now there are 7,500 persons in the district municipality — working in the smelter, constructing the additions and building homes.

There are 1,000 permanent homes in the first section of the townsite. There is a weekly newspaper, a beer parlor seating 600, a railway station, garage, liquid air plant, supermarket, restaurants and taxis.

An estimated 2,000 cars roll over 12 miles of roads.

Ships from the tropics tie up to a deep-sea dock and the alumina is moved from their holds onto a high conveyor spanning the roofs of the six long, metal buildings which comprise the two present pot lines. The alumina is fed by gravity into hoppers.

BIG POWER CONSUMPTION

Below are the rooms with the long, flat furnaces where sweating men in goggles and breathing-masks keep the heat constant and the aluminum flowing.

In these rooms terminate the power lines that began 80 miles to the southeast, in Kemano, power generating station for Kitimat. There, in an underground powerhouse, 150,000-horsepower generators turn out the power needed to make aluminum.

It flows through heavy cables over the perpetual snow of the Kildala pass to Kitimat.

In the potlines it keeps the electrodes fiercely hot.

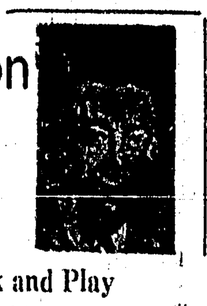
It takes 20,000 kilowatt hours of electrical energy to process one ton of aluminum — enough power to serve the average Canadian home for 12 years.

This initial stage of construction has cost Alcan $225,000,000 — half the amount budgetted for the overall project.

Second of this series on Kitimat will be published tomorrow.

BLACKWOOD on BRIDGE

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD



Five Clubs Are Made By Good Luck and Play

You could hardly call Miss Brash's five club contract a laydown. Looking only at the North-South cards there is at least a possibility of losing one spade, two hearts, a diamond and a club.

But Miss Brash is used to being in contracts like this. As usual she brought this one home through a combination of good luck and good play.

Break number one came on the opening lead. Mr. Meek was in a bad spot. With considerable reason he figured that any lead he made would lose a trick. He finally selected the ace of hearts and followed with the queen of hearts.

Miss Brash won with the king and decided to go for the diamond finesse. She led the deuce from her hand and put in dummy's jack, which held the trick.

NO FINESSE

Now, she led back the five of clubs. But here she decided against the finesse. The reason? Because Mr. Meek, on her left, had not only opened the bidding but had rebid freely opposite a passing partner.

He could therefore be figured for every outstanding face card. Miss Brash hoped he had the king of clubs guarded only once. She planned to go up with her ace of clubs and lead another club. If Mr. Meek did have the king doubleton, he would again find himself in a very tough spot for a lead.

This was excellent reasoning and it turned out even better than Miss Brash had expected. As you see, the king of clubs fell under the ace.

West dealer. Neither side vulnerable.

TRUMPS OUT

After pulling two more rounds of trumps, Miss Brash returned to the diamond suit. She led the queen, Mr. Meek covered with the king, the ace went on from dummy—and down came Mr. Dale's ten spot.

From here on it was easy sailing. Miss Brash returned to her hand with the eight of diamonds. Then she entered dummy with the ace of spades and parked her losing spade on dummy's nine of diamonds. Thus she won all the tricks but one.

"Oh dear," she said, "Isn't there some way we could have bid the slam?" She considers three or four lucky breaks in a hand as perfectly normal.

"Well, I thought of bidding six," kidded Mr. Abel. "But I was afraid you might be encouraged to try seven and at that bid I thought there was an outside chance of being down one."

"Oh, you men," Miss Brash chided. "You're so timid."
