JAPANESE CANADIAN INTERESTS

Nipponese Consul Suggests Improved Relations Between Two Countries and Extended Trade

The relations between Canada and Japan were the subject of an address yesterday afternoon before the Prince Rupert Rotary club at its regular weekly luncheon by Kenji Nakauchi, Japanese consul at Vancouver. He spoke of the way in which Prince Rupert was connected with Japan in having a number of his countrymen residing here as peaceful and happy citizens. It was in 1867 that the Dominion of Canada came into being. Two years later Japan turned her eyes westward. Both nations conceived similar ambitions—development mainly in the form of economic, political and social security through industrial expansion. How the two countries have developed is a matter of history.

Mr. Nakauchi said that on the manner the mutual problems and interests of Canada and Japan are to be settled rests considerably on the cultivation of a firm friendship between them in the near future. Canada and Japan have many problems in common and from them two fundamental forms of economy emerge—trade and industry. The rise of Japan must be regarded tolerantly if Canada wished to promote friendship. The sudden rise of Japan did not mean that she would swallow world trade entirely but it should be recognized that she was a late comer and her adaptability to modern environment had made her particularly conspicuous in competition for trade.

The visitor said it was his opinion that Canada should provide Japan with the raw materials she needed. Japan had invested private capital in British Columbia, particularly in such industries as fishing, agriculture and lumbering. This provided work for Canadians. Japan could sell to Canada highly finished goods while Canada sold to Japan her surplus products, such as wheat, flour, copper, lead, salt herring, and soft timber. He quoted Sir Herbert Marler to show that this country might purchase greater quantities of manufactured goods of far greater variety than at present. At present Japan imported four times as much Canadian goods as she sold in return.

The consul referred to the fact that relations between Canada and Japan had been rather strained mainly because of the China affair. Fortunately the situation in the Orient was improving and peace and order was being established. It was the sincere desire of the Japanese people and government that security and peace should be maintained in the East where Japan had vital interests. She wished to cultivate friendships with western people. Canada, as one of the Allied powers striving to win the war, he felt sure, was desirous of improving relations with Japan, a country that was maintaining strict neutrality. The two countries had a common purpose, that of maintaining peace in the Pacific and of promoting mutual interests. It was his sincere hope that the troubles on the European and Asian continents would never extend to this part of the world.
