Education Week

November 4 - 9

(By a Parent)

For a matter of 12 years, from five to six hours a day, a child is under the guidance of a teacher so the teacher is, or should be, a very important person indeed. Teaching is an art with a great responsibility because it deals with the human mind, a mind that may be developed or destroyed. Just how far either way depends to a great extent on the teacher.

There are several relationships involved in the school life of a child—that of the teacher to the child, of the child to his studies, of the child to other children and that very important relationship of the parent and teacher.

By the time graduation from High School is reached we no longer have a child but a student of 17 or 18 years of age. We parents hope that whether he continues to university or not he will still be a student in that he will have the desire to pursue his learning. He will have been so guided that he has been enabled to grasp more learning.

Of necessity, the teacher has to handle the group. Most parents understand that but I think we should like to feel that there existed an understanding of our own particular child: "a meeting of the personalities of the teacher and child."

Children will accept guidance only from one for whom they have respect. They early learn to recognize ability, dignity and understanding. The happiest relationship that can possibly exist is one in which the teacher is the child's assistant in making knowledge his own.

All subjects of the curriculum are there for a purpose and are the result of much research on the part of the educators who are constantly working to fit the curriculum to the child and to the times. In these days of so much cheap reading material a teacher will have accomplished much who can instil in the student an interest and taste for good literature. There are many clear lessons in history. From them a student should derive a consciousness of his cultural and social heritage and in such a way that he will have a fair working knowledge of it. He will see the place in the set-up of his own nation and his community, of his own family and himself. If he is to be a good citizen he must be aware of his duty to maintain this heritage.

The trend of today is towards more leisure for all. This will result in more time for mischief for all and more discontent if there is no cultivating of a profitable interest for these leisure moments. There should be taught an active and vital appreciation of painting, music, sculpture of any enjoyments that recreate and educate.

The relationship of the child to his work is not solely the responsibility of the teacher. Study habits, good or bad, are formed early. Assigned home study is a necessary part of school work and parents are shirking their duty who do not see that conditions at home are conducive to its being done. After all, co-operation is one of the things we parents hope our children will learn on their way through school. Here is one place at least where we can do a bit of co-operating.

Individualism must not be overlooked but group working and group playing should be the training ground for group behaviour in later life. Physical training and games are necessary but have the desired result only when supervised by qualified instructors.

It would seem too, in these days of counsellors whose business it is to study the aptitudes of the students that boys and girls should be trained for the place in life most suited to his and her native ability. There should be fewer misfits. Parents who wish a bit of advice as to the career of their children might do well to consult the counsellors.

We ask a good deal of our teachers but we cannot expect them to be altogether altruistic about it. What we wish them to give our children takes long and continuous training so the remuneration should be such as to induce the most capable people into the profession and people who will give of their best.

I think all parents hope that during their school life their children will receive the training that will turn them out, whether to college or straight to the business of life, healthy, happy young people with alert open minds. Young people with a love of life and a zest for learning. We hope they will be capable of recognizing and assuming their responsibilities, capable of taking advantage of every opportunity and at the same time willing and ready to make their contribution to society.
