BLACKWOOD on BRIDGE

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

In any gathering of players who go beyond the stage of conversational bridge, there is a Mr. Rhule. He plays strictly by the book. He not only learns every new bidding or playing convention, but he temporarily builds his entire system around it.

At one time he used the Blackwood four-no trump bid on every big hand, regardless of whether his partner's response would help him in deciding about a slam. Later he adopted the four club bid to ask for aces and proceeded to commit mayhem on John Gerber's favorite bid.

He went through a stage of fascination with the "prepared club," opening with one club almost every time he opened the bidding.

Mr. Dale

Now he is a Stayman addict, a suit preference fanatic, and a strict point counter. He opens one no trump on hands which should have been opened with a suit bid, just to give his partner a chance to say two clubs.

When he gets a good result he gives slavish credit to whatever convention he thinks applied to the situation, never realizing that the same good results would in most cases, develop through the use of ordinary common sense.

Today he made the fine opening lead of the deuce of diamonds. He partner won with the king and return a club which he ruffed for the setting trick.

"Nice bidding and nice play, partner," said Mr. Dale, beaming.

"If it hadn't been for my suit preference signal of the deuce of diamonds, we would never have beaten this one," gloated Mr. Rhule.

Mr. Dale hadn't thought of it that way. He had merely remembered that Mr. Champion had gone all the way to six clubs without support in that suit from Mrs. Keen.

He must have started with at least six clubs and probably seven. Mr. Rhule could have opened any diamond (except the ace, of course) and Mr. Dale would have won with the king and returned a club, on sheer logic.

Maurice Richard of Montreal Canadiens scored the 500th goal of his NHL career, including playoffs, as Canadiens defeated Toronto Maple Leafs four years ago last night at Montreal. The crowd of 13,784 gave the Rocket a standing ovation as he netted the first counter in a 5-2 victory for Canadiens.

Hunting was a $1 billion business in 1959 with 20 million participants. Bowling was another business which suddenly crossed the $1 billion a year mark.

It's a FACT

The wild bushmen of Australia can make a boomerang curve in an amazing manner. They can throw it so that it will travel straight for 30 yards, describe a circle 50 yards in diameter and then return to the thrower; or they can make it hit the ground, circle in the air and return.
