BLACKWOOD on BRIDGE

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

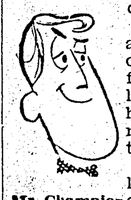
"I did too know what I was doing," said Mr. Muzzy petulantly.

"You wouldn't have figured that play out in a thousand years," roared Mr. Champion. "Everything happens to me. I think I'll quit the game."

"A great idea," said Mr. Muzzy firmly.

The cause of this exchange was a beautiful, if unconscious, defensive play by Mr. Muzzy.

When he sorted his hand he got the king of diamonds mixed in with his hearts. As it happened, this error served him very well. On the opening lead of the five of diamonds he played the jack, believing it to be the only diamond he had.



Mr. Champion

Miss Brash, who at first had visions of losing the first five tricks, was delighted to win with her queen. Wouldn't you have done the same?

At trick two she led the jack of clubs and finessed it. Mr. Muzzy won with the king and it was at this point that he finally noticed he had the king of diamonds.

"Wait a minute, these cards are mixed up," he complained.

"Nobody's but yours, probably," remarked Mr. Champion.

In any case, Mr. Muzzy now led the elusive king of diamonds and Mrs. Keen overtook with the ace and cashed three more tricks in the suit to defeat the contract.

When there are no important cards on the board in the suit your partner has led against a no trump contract, it is almost always best to play third hand high.

However, the awkward set-up of the diamonds in this particular deal represented an exception. If Mr. Muzzy had played the king at trick one, Miss Brash could not have gone wrong.

On the jack of diamonds return at trick two she would have played the nine. Mrs. Keen could not overtake with the ace without setting up the queen. And if she did not overtake, the jack would hold, but diamonds could not be continued because Mr. Muzzy would be out of the suit.

On this line of play Miss Brash would have been able to win at least three clubs, two hearts and four spades for game.

Windlass clue to old wreck

VICTORIA (CP) — The first solid clue to the identity of an ancient ship sunk off Vancouver Island's remote west coast was uncovered today by navy investigators.

Removal of a thick layer of marine growth from a windlass brought up from the barnacle-encrusted wreck by navy divers recently revealed the name of the maker: Tyler Dobinson and Co.

Naval authorities now are attempting to determine the origin of the company and commented the name sounds either British or American.
