Takeout Double Advantages Far Outweigh Disadvantages

My mail indicates that many players consider the takeout double the most baffling department of the game. I agree that it is the most complex of all "bids." How much strength do you need to make such a double? What do you do when partner doubles and the next hand bids or redoubles?

How do you distinguish a takeout double from a penalty double? Let's look into the situation in the next few columns and see what makes the takeout double tick—or backfire, as the case may be.

MAIN REASONS

Here are the principal reasons why the takeout double and the response thereto are often difficult to handle. First, the simple fact that you have to double for

The bidding:

West	North	East	South
		3 ♦	3 ♠
Pass	4 ♠	All Pass

A takeout means your opponents have got the jump on you by opening the bidding.

They have already "announced" a possible line of defense to be used if your side plays the hand. And, having exchanged some information at the start, they are in a position to crowd the bidding so you may never find your right spot.

In today's hand, for example, Mr. Masters had to lose a diamond and three spades for down one, while 10 tricks were readily available at a contract of four hearts.

Nobody made any bidding errors and yet hearts were not even mentioned. There wasn't time. Of course, four hearts might not have been reached with Mr. Abel as the opening bidder, although it would have been more likely that way.

MAKE BID SPEAK

A good player likes to make each bid tell something about two features of his hand—how much high card strength he holds and where that strength is.

In today's deal Mr. Abel would like to have said, "I have a good hand, including a five-card heart suit," but unfortunately that wouldn't have been legal. A takeout double says only that the doubler has a good hand. It doesn't tell what his best suit is.

And yet the advantages of the takeout double far outweigh its disadvantages. In the next few days I want to suggest ways to use it for your maximum profit.
