Survey Shows Working Wives Do Best Housecleaning Job

By DOROTHY ROE

NEW YORK (AP)—Working wives are better housekeepers than their stay-at-home sisters, and ask less help from their husbands, says Madge Lewyt, who spends most of her time inquiring into women's housekeeping habits.

A few years ago Miss Lewyt volunteered to help her brother compile some facts about how modern women clean house, and she has been at it ever since. The brother is Alex Lewyt, manufacturer of vacuum cleaners and other items. Says sister Madge, who bears the title of research consultant:

"In recent surveys I have found that women who work at a full-time job away from home all day tackle their housework the same way they do their office work. They organize it efficiently and don't get bogged down in it.

OLD-FASHIONED METHODS

"Women who stay at home all day are likely to dawdle along at housework, using old-fashioned methods they learned from their mothers. There's probably something psychological about it. These women have a feeling they aren't doing an important job in just keeping house, and so they try to make it sound as hard as possible.

"These are the women who do most of the complaining when their husbands come home at night, and the ones who act hurt if their husbands don't help with the dishes or other chores."

Working women, on the other hand, says Miss Lewyt, seem to take pride in being able to do two jobs and do both well. She says:

"Most women who work outside their home manage to keep it tidy and give the house a thorough cleaning once a week, usually on Saturdays.

"They learn to empty ashtrays and straighten up the living room before they go to bed at night, spending only a few minutes at it, but leaving it neat. They put away their clothes when they take them off, and keep up with all the little things that keep a house neat, instead of letting them pile up."

Miss Lewyt has found that some women take all day to clean house simply because they have all day to spend. Actually it should be possible to give a thorough cleaning to a three-or-four room apartment in not more than two hours, she says.

Women who spend all day in an office seem to find a relaxation in doing the feminine chores of cooking and housecleaning after work, she says. They also make use of all the modern shortcuts they can find, and can clean a house in half the time it used to take their mothers.

Says Miss Lewyt:

"After all the time I've spent inquiring into such things, I've become convinced that it's better for both wives and husbands if the wife has a job outside the home, provided there are no small children."
