BLACKWOOD on BRIDGE

B/ EASLEY BLACKWOOD

Partial score situations result in some strange final contracts. In today's deal Mr. Masters found himself playing a small slam at hearts, with a singleton heart in his hand. He made that contract by good handling of the trump suit.

Seven clubs was ice-cold although admittedly it was hard to reach. Three hearts would have been a better bid than four no trump on the North hand. That would have been forcing for one round and at his next turn Mr. Abel could have bid his clubs. Even if the grand slam were missed, the safer contract of six clubs undoubtedly would have been reached.

The six-heart bid was on thin ice from the start. The king of spades opening was ruffed in dummy and Mr. Masters then led a heart to his lone ace. He now gave some thought as to how he should go back to dummy to pull the remaining trumps.

Mr. Masters

Holding as many as 10 clubs in his hand and dummy, there appeared to be considerable danger that a club lead at this point would be ruffed. On the other hand one trick could be lost without going set and, since the deal was freakish in nature, there was also the consideration that one of the defenders may have started with five hearts.

If one opponent was void in clubs, then the odds favored his having the longer heart holding. And maybe his hearts needed to be shortened.

On this thinking Mr. Masters avoided the "safe" play of entering dummy by ruffing another spade. Instead he led a club at the third trick and went up with dummy's ace.

Mrs. Keen ruffed but that was her side's last trick. She returned the king of diamonds and Mr. Masters took the ace, got to the board by ruffing a diamond and had just enough trumps there to pick up Mrs. Keen's last ones. The club suit then won the rest of the tricks.

If he had entered dummy at trick three by ruffing a spade, Mrs. Keen would have had more trumps than dummy and the contract would have been hopeless.

PERSONALS

Lloyd Franklin, with his mother Mrs. Lester Franklin, 718 Lotbienere Street, returned this week from a three-week holiday in California where they visited Disneyland.

TIME and PLACE

sisting on an occasional spoon of raw flour and the few handouts which could be spared from the telegraph office.

Time went on, and these prospectors dreamed and made plans on what good things they would buy on the proceeds of this marten skin they were going to sell when the first boat came up in the spring. Finally the great day arrived—the Hazelton came in with George Cunningham, trader, aboard. Olalie and Carlson took a trip with him through the canyon while dickering with him over the marten skin, for which they thought they should certainly get $6.50. Well the long and short of it was they came off the boat at the head of the canyon minus marten skin or $6.50, but both well lit; and coming home in the evening over that wagon road still slightly inebriated Johnson fell into a gravel pit, which, owing to melting snow and spring rains, contained an amount of water. He was in mortal terror, thrashing about, and calling, "Help me Charlie, Help me! I've fallen into the canyon; I'm drowning." Charlie hollered back, "Swim Olalie, swim Olalie, swim for your life." The experience sobered them up so much that they were able to tell the story by the time they got back to the telegraph office.

About a mile west of Kitselas two ranchers, Ed Youngdal and Louis Anderson had a 320-acre preemption, and further on, on the other side of Gold (Kleanza) Creek was another rancher-prospector, Milo Kendal, with a 160-acre homestead. The Singlehurst Mining Co., found from this place a shorter and more convenient point to get supplies to their property, with stopping and storage places at the foot and half way up the mountain. They used mules as pack animals.

During the hot summer of 1904 when unchecked fires raged all over this part of the country, these places all burned down to the accompaniment of one blast of dynamite after another as various caches of explosives, pilfered by the prospectors and hidden in different places on Bornite Mountain ignited.

PERSONALS

In port for a few hours today while making the Alaskan cruise aboard the Prince George were Miss Catharine Grosch of the Vancouver Sun, women's department and Mrs. Teresa Jones of San Francisco.
