BLACKWOOD on BRIDGE

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

Mr. Heinsite Bogs Down In Trying To Simplify

Of course it can't always be done, but whenever possible it is to your advantage to keep the bidding sequence short and simple. A long, involved series of fancy bids increases the chance of some horrible misunderstanding somewhere along the line.

And it gives the opponents information from which they are more likely to hit upon their best opening and their best defense throughout the hand.

In today's deal Mr. Dale led the queen of clubs and Mr. Abel won with the ace and returned the suit. Mr. Muzzy won with the king. He looked the situation over and was pessimistic about his chances. This was justified.

SET THREE

He decided to try to ruff a spade on the board. He led to dummy's king and returned a spade to his ace. But it was Mr. Dale who ruffed a spade. After much agony Mr. Muzzy managed to hold the set to three tricks.

"Why bid hearts first, man?" asked Mr. Heinsite.

"I wanted to reverse to show a big hand," Mr. Muzzy replied.

Mr. Heinsite shook his head in disgust. "A little learning is a dangerous thing," he said, for the millionth time. "You base your whole bidding system on one little gadget, the reverse.

"With five hearts and four spades, plus a big hand, you do bid hearts first and then spades. But not with four cards in each suit. You just can't afford the risk of telling me you have five hearts as your bidding did.

"We belonged in three no trump," Mr. Heinsite continued. "Nine tricks are cold and with a club opening you'd have ten tricks without risk. The way to get there is for you to open with one spade. I'd say two diamonds and you'd bid two hearts. Then I'd bid . . ."

Here Mr. Heinsite bogged down. Just what would he bid next? Would he say two no trump with three worthless clubs in his hand? For once he had stumped himself.

"Speaking of a little learning," remarked Mr. Dale, "would it be too innocent or too amateurish for the bidding to go simply 'one no trump' from Muzzy and 'three no trump' from you?"
