SCIENCE IN YOUR LIFE

Fighting A Cat Killer

Distemper in cats is a common and usually fatal disease with many medical names, the most widely accepted of which is "feline enteritis". Caused by a virus, distemper is often aggravated by other disease germs.

Many a cat owner has watched helplessly while his pet has crouched over its water dish, dying of thirst but unable to drink because its distemper-inflamed throat can no longer swallow. Farmers are as concerned with distemper as are city people who keep cats solely for pets. To the farmer, a healthy cat is a working animal, which can prevent the destruction of much valuable property by rats.

Vaccines and anti-viral serums have proven their worth in preventing the disease, but they are expensive at best, and are of little use in treating distemper once it has established itself. In recent years, however, veterinarians have made an important discovery about this illness: it is not the virus which kills the cat, but the bacteria which invade the animal's intestines after the virus has lowered its resistance. If those bacteria are knocked out by the antibiotic Terramycin, most infected cats can be saved.

Without such treatment, the death rate from cat distemper is as high as 80 to 90 per cent. Thus the introduction of this broad-range antibiotic has markedly changed the outlook for cat owners.

Bonus Item

REGINA (CP) — Gabriel Flutur broke a large egg open and then invited four of his neighbors for breakfast. The egg, which came from a chicken on Cliff Olson's farm at Roudlyn, had four yolks.

The dolphin can pace vessels sliding through the waves at 30 knots.
