SCIENCE IN YOUR LIFE

Facing The Chair

Years ago, a Boston court ruled that a tooth was worth $1,000. On that basis, your teeth are valued at $32,000 – if you still have them all.

Yet many people let these valuable assets fall into a dangerous state of decay because they can't bear the thought of dentist drills and extractions. In a few extreme cases, patients have actually become sick when they entered their dentist's office. Children are perhaps the worst offenders, often turning into unruly monsters as soon as they're asked to open their mouths.

One effective way dentists can get around the problem is to use Atarax, a tranquilizer syrup given 15 minutes before drilling begins. A dentist in Larchmont, N.Y., reports that it quickly eases jittery patients, greatly reducing all signs of their nervousness. It works wonders with children too. They still don't like dentist drills, but they no longer react with those uncontrolled tantrums.

However, the best way to avoid dental jitters is to prevent tooth decay. The American Dental Association recommends a complete dental examination at least twice a year – and more often if you get cavities easily. During these check ups, be sure to have your teeth cleaned thoroughly.

Don't forget the brushing-after-each-meal routine. It is still one of the most effective ways to guard against dental trouble.
