Need for foster homes still urgent PTA told

The Social Welfare department is only as strong as the community concern for its children is strong, Booth Memorial high school Parent-Teacher association members were told.

Speaking at the PTA regular meeting Wednesday night, guest speaker William Prokop, district supervisor of the Department of Social Welfare for the Prince Rupert area, outlined the services offered by the Social Welfare department.

FOSTER HOMES

"Still the biggest need in Prince Rupert is for foster homes," Mr. Prokop said.

He also reiterated that the greatest difficulty his department locally experiences is the lack of staff and lack of professional training in staff members.

He said that there are 1,160 cases of which 500 are active in this district, which includes east to Shames, north to the the Queen Charlotte Islands, east to Shames, north to the 57th parallel and south to a distance of 30 miles from Prince Rupert including the islands.

THREE WORKERS

"For this area we have three social workers, each carrying a generalized case load," he said.

The social supervisor explained how the work was divided into 18 categories which he classified into five main divisions, pensions, social allowance, health and institutional, miscellaneous and child welfare.

In a question period which followed Mr. Prokop's address, concern for the problems mentioned and suggestions for correction were brought out by the membership.

Some 60 members attended the session, concluded with refreshments.
