It's a fact

Largely because of the discoveries of a brilliant young Frenchman, Jean Francois Champollion, historians have been able to trace the life, customs and religion of Egyptian cultures as far back as 3500 B.C. In 1822, Champollion found the key to the long-lost secret of hieroglyphic writing through a laborious comparison of the Greek, Egyptian and hieroglyphic writing on the famous "Rosetta Stone," a black slab of basalt which had lain for centuries near one of the mouths of the Nile River.

BLACKWOOD on BRIDGE

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

Mr. Masters had to do a very special bit of trump suit management to bring home his contract in today's deal. Apparently success depended on guessing the location of the queen of trumps. Mr. Masters made that guess correctly but he found that he still had a lot of work to do.

The defenders started off by winning three club tricks, ending in Mr. Abel's hand. He then shifted to a small diamond and the eight spot from Mrs. Keen's hand forced out the ace.

Mr. Masters led a small heart to dummy's king, returned the four-spot and finessed the ten. The ten held and that was good, but Mr. Abel showed out, discarding a small diamond—which was very bad indeed.

The queen of hearts was now located in Mrs. Keen's hand but unfortunately there were no more trumps in dummy to lead through for another finesse.

Mr. Masters

Mr. Masters realized there was still a chance to make the hand. The first thing he had to do was to reduce his trumps to the same number held by Mrs. Keen. He led his last diamond to the king on the board, played a diamond back and ruffed it low.

At this point he needed two more entries to dummy. The only chance for these entries was the spade suit, so he led the seven of spades and finessed dummy's jack when Mr. Abel played low.

Dummy's last diamond was now ruffed with the seven of hearts. Mrs. Keen discarding the five of spades. Mr. Masters then overtook his king of spades with the ace and the contract was assured when Mrs. Keen followed suit.

Opening lead: King of clubs.

With everybody down to two cards, the closed hand had ace-jack of hearts and Mrs. Keen had queen-nine of hearts. A spade was led from dummy at trick twelve and it was all over.

Mr. Abel could have made quite a defensive play by putting up the queen on the first lead of spades. This would have forced dummy's ace and left Mr. Masters with the lone king, thus eliminating one of the entries to the board.

It was a tough play for Mr. Abel to make and he didn't even see it after the hand was over. The need for the play comes up very seldom, which points up the fact that the edge of the truly fine player lies in his ability to recognize the unusual situation—and then to have the nerve to take the necessary action.
