WEARING HER sou'wester to "take care of typical Prince Rupert baseball weather" is Babs Smith who won the headpiece on Saturday night at the annual baseball banquet. An ardent fan, Mrs. Smith is seen with Sam Marsh, one of the city's most faithful baseball fans. Mr. Marsh is reported not to have missed a ball game in 2 years. Shown in photo at top right is John Olsen (left), captain of Moose and Bruce Kerr (right) Gyro captain with championship trophies they received at the Prince Rupert Pony League banquet Friday night. The Moose team captured the league title and Gyros won the playoff championship. Mayor P. J. Lester is shown in picture at bottom right presenting Kerr with the award.

AL CAMPBELL, Esquire third baseman, was presented with the rookie-of-the-year award at the baseball banquet Saturday night. Commissioner R. G. (Rusty) Ford made the presentation.

Excitement, Errol Flynn synonymous all his life

By BOB THOMAS

HOLLYWOOD (AP)—What was Errol Flynn really like behind the role he played in life as the pleasure-loving man of the world?

The answer: A pleasure-loving man of the world.

For if Flynn had any moments of doubt and depression, he never showed them, even to his closest friends. Psychiatrists might argue that his twin hobbies of booze and babes were the result of basic insecurity, perhaps caused by his roving youth.

Flynn couldn't have cared less for head-shrinkers' theories. He continued to pursue the life he loved, pausing occasionally for flings at matrimony. Through thick and thin, he was persistently debonair.

Like Mario Lanza, who died a week earlier, Flynn had monumental money troubles. But while they helped to unhinge Lanza, financial problems bothered Flynn not at all.

Once he found himself in alimony arrears to two ex-wives and owing $820,000 back income taxes—plus hotel and bar bills on two continents. His comment: "I may have to print my own money if my bills keep piling up."

The newspaper files are thick with clippings about Flynn's escapades, yet he claimed "I have never in my life sought headlines nor have I in any way gone after publicity stunts or anything of that nature."

He didn't have to. He seldom employed a press agent, because he didn't need one. All he had to do was breeze into town and things started to happen.

Flynn was in typical form on my last encounter with him. It was earlier this year in Cuba. Flynn was taking part in the Castro revolution from the Havana Hilton Hotel.

He held court in his suite, with a bearded, rifle-bearing rebel and the inevitable chick, whom he introduced as his social secretary. She patted his cheek and brought him drinks from a bar in the corner.

The actor told of his baptism of fire—he and the secretary had been blasted out of another suite by a conflagration possibly caused by a smoldering cigaret.

"The whole place was aflame, but I didn't panic," he said. "I called the front desk and told them about it. The place was soon swarming with rebels. They thought it was a plot against their leader, who is also staying in the hotel.

"It is surprising now I viewed the whole thing with detachment. It was the same way up in the shooting in the hill country. I guess it was my years of training in those Warner Brothers pictures. Actual danger seems unreal to me now."

Irish writer main heckler at own play

By EDDY GILMORE

LONDON (AP)—Fortified by Dublin stout and Gaelic whisky, Irish playwright Brendan Behan has made another boisterous personal appearance Monday night at his own show.

As in a previous performance, six weeks ago, he was unscheduled, unexpected and unwanted. Once again the wild Irishman outshouted the actors.

His play is called "The Hostage" and it's about the Irish Republican Army. Every time Behan visits London from his Dublin home, he shows up at his show sooner or later.

A full house was watching the play unfold when its hulking author staggered into the rear of Wyndhams Theatre. He wore a red shirt, baggy flannel slacks and a rumped sports jacket.

He began by bellowing the lines before the actors could speak them.

"Shut up," yelled a member of the cast.

"Shut up yourself," roared Brendan. "Why don't you do the bloody play properly?"

Then he sagged to a sitting position in the aisle and commenced singing an Irish ballad.

Leading man Howard Goorney halted the performance and pleaded for quiet.

"This is a good play," he said, "but the author is doing his best to muck it up.'

Brendan interrupted him with a salvo of unprintable language.

Why don't you throw him out?" called a man in the audience.

"How the hell can I?" asked the manager. "He's the author."

With assistance from other members of the audience, Brendan slowly got to his feet and lurched to an empty seat in the last row.

Governor refuses to stay convict's scheduled death

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP)—Governor Edmund Brown, a foe of capital punishment, refused Monday to step in to save convicted-author Caryl Chessman from execution.

The "red light bandit" of Los Angeles' lovers' lanes will die in San Quentin's gas chambers Friday unless the courts intervene. A final appeal is pending before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Chessman was convicted in 1948 on 17 counts of kidnapping, robbery and attempted rape.

In prowling lovers' lanes, he posed as a policeman by using a red material over the spotlight of his car.

Chessman has maintained his innocence throughout 11½ years in death row.

Brown said Chessman, who wrote a best-selling book on his stay in death row, has declared he seeks only vindication, not clemency and "this I cannot give him."

"The evidence of his guilt is overwhelming," Brown said.

Brown, father of three daughters and a son studying for the priesthood, noted that one of Chessman's victims, then a 17-year-old girl, still is "hopelessly confined" in a state mental hospital.

Five youths remanded

LADNER, B.C. (CP)—Five teenagers, arrested Sunday in connection with an across-the-border raid on a grocery store in Point Roberts, Wash., were remanded Monday to November 3.

The five 18-year-old youths appeared in police court here, charged with possession of stolen goods.

They were among a group of 16—five girls and 11 boys—picked up by police following a break-in at the M. H. Whalen store in Point Roberts.

Appearing today were David Graham Kelly, Robert Urselman, John Saundy, Roy Parsons and Howard Plumber, all of Vancouver. All but Plumber were released on their own recognizance.
