PANAMA CANAL OPENS YEAR FROM JANUARY

Vessels Will Go Through Before, but It Will Not Be Open for General Commerce.

Officials of several steamship companies, which have arranged to send their fleets through the Panama Canal, have announced that in all probability regular service will not be established until January, 1915. This is based upon the belief that the government will not be in a position to guarantee the permanent opening of the canal for commerce before that time.

It is expected that the engineers will permit vessels to pass through the canal earlier than that, but in the event of a slide the great waterway would be thrown out of commission and schedules would be disarranged.

Representatives of the Harrison Line explain that much of the shipping business is based upon contracts involving price and time delivery. Most of those countracts run for one or two years. In the event that ships began to operate through the canal and an accident made it necessary to resume the service through Magellan Strait, the company would be unable to comply with its contracts.

A CORRECTION

To the Editor:

I regret very much that a statement in your last evening's issue would make it appear that to myself and Mr. Hobin belongs the credit of trying to get insurance rates lowered in Prince Rupert. Every other agent of a Board company here is equally entitled to as much credit as Mr. Hobin and myself, although our position as chairman and secretary respectively of the local fire committee have naturally brought us more to the front than the other agents.

I may say as chairman of the above committee that all the agents of this city have displayed the greatest sincerity and disinterestedness in endeavoring to have insurance matters so adjusted as to give the best possible satisfaction to the insuring public.

Yours faithfully,
C. W. PECK.
