BATTLESHIPS ARE USELESS

That is View Taken by Sir Percy Scott and Forcibly Expressed

RAN FROM SUBMARINES

Attack Made on Proposal For Dominions to Aid in Singapore Docks

LONDON, Nov. 8.—Speaking at the Royal Colonial Institute to the members of the Australian Natives' Association on the question, "Should Australia and New Zealand subscribe towards building docks at Singapore for our latest battleships?" Sir Percy Scott said that he had been asking for four years what our new battleships were being built for, but could get no answer.

Admiral Fulham, an American, had said that with battleships they would be fighting the battles of the future with the weapons of the past. "He means to say they are damned fools and I rather agree with him," said Sir Percy. (Laughter).

The First Lord of the Admiralty had stated that submarines had never affected the free movements of the fleet. Admiral Sir Cecil Lambert very quickly fell foul of him, characterising that statement as the greatest contradiction of positive fact for which a cabinet minister had ever been responsible. "I hope that will appear in the papers. The First Lord will be very pleased to read it in the morning." (Laughter).

Ships Ran Away

Sir Percy Scott then enumerated some of the achievements of submarines during the war and, referring to the statement of a distinguished admiral that when the battleships ran away from a little submarine in the Mediterranean it was because the ships were in the wrong place, said he thought that was a severe reprimand for the Admiralty. It would be interesting to that audience because it demonstrated that the Dominions could protect themselves with submarines, battleships that should visit their coast being sure to find themselves in the wrong place. (Laughter). "If," he said, "the waters of all countries are protected by submarines all waters will be wrong waters for battleships to go to, and if that is so where are they to go? (Laughter).

Doves of Peace

He was inclined to agree with the midshipman who said "Battleships are no damned use at all." The American Admiral he had quoted had said that it looked as if in future they would be unable to carry war from one continent to another, and so the new weapons might be doves of peace. "The typewriter," said Sir Percy glancing at his notes, "has made it 'duds' of peace.'" (Laughter). He ridiculed the proposals in regard to Singapore—the spending of anything up to 50 millions on the same rubbishy old "sports" that anybody could knock to pieces with a peashooter. (Laughter).

Positively Wicked

"To me," he declared, "it appears positively wicked in face of the immense unemployment that we should be sending millions to Singapore for the employment of native labor." The Admiralty knows that in view of the new weapons battleships could not get to the East and that the docks are not required. They only want to squeeze money out of the Dominions." "Anybody," he declared, "in the Dominions who contributes to these docks ought to be shot—(laughter)—for it is wilful, wanton waste of the taxpayers' money."

ENGLISH NEWSPAPERS HAVE NEW OWNERS

Hulton Group Divided Between Lord Rothermere and Lord Beaverbrook

LONDON, Nov. 8.—(Canadian Press).—The disposal of the Hulton group of English daily and weekly newspapers to Lord Rothermere and Lord Beaverbrook, the latter acquiring the papers hitherto published by Hulton's in London and Lord Rothermere taking the remaining publications issued in Manchester, is an event which, while of less general interest than the purchase of the Times by Lord Northcliffe some years back, is of even greater moment to workers in the newspaper field in the Old Country. In thirty years or less the firm of Hulton has built up a business second only in size, so far as Great Britain is concerned, to the undertaking which the late Lord Northcliffe and his brother, Lord Rothermere, brought into being.

Hulton's History

Edward Hulton, founder of the firm, was a Manchester man of humble origin. His early life was certainly not spent in a newspaper office, but he evidently possessed the flair for recognising what a considerable proportion of the teeming population of industrial workers in and around Manchester were especially glad to get in the way of news of the day. Horse racing, then as now, was one of the chief interests of the masses—the interest, it is hardly necessary to say, being almost confined to a following of the "form" of horses and the odds quoted by the bookies. Edward Hulton the First, conceived the idea of ministering to the needs of this class of sportsman in and around his native city by producing an early morning sheet devoted entirely to racing, football and the like. The earlier issues, the story runs, were run off by the proprietor-editor himself, he was his own circulation manager, accountant and everything else. From the first the enterprise made money; the millworker of Manchester, it was asserted would rather have denied himself his breakfast than his early morning perusal of the Sporting Chronicle. The next venture was the Manchester Evening Chronicle, a paper designed to appeal to the general reader in the great English cotton district. Success likewise attended this venture, for there was an element of snap and brightness which up to then had been lacking in most of the papers of the north of England.
