SEGREGATION NATIVE RACES

Problem Is Being Discussed Today in South Africa Where it Is Live Question

LONDON, Aug. 9.—(Canadian Press).—The question of the segregation of the native races of South Africa, which is of more than ordinary interest to the people of the British Empire at the present time because of the measures proposed by the Hertzog government to segregate the natives to a considerable extent, was touched on by Sir John Chancellor, governor of Southern Rhodesia, in a recent address to the African Society here.

Sir John said there was no difference of opinion among those who had knowledge of South African conditions that some measure of segregation of the natives was essential to the comfort and happiness of Europeans and natives alike and to the maintenance of goodwill between the two races.

Not Absolute

"But when we talk about segregation," he said, "we must be quite sure that we all mean the same thing. Absolute segregation of the natives, that is, their removal from all relationship and contact with the white races, would be impracticable and disastrous. It would be economically impracticable and the Europeans would suffer from complete segregation no less than the natives. It would be disastrous to the native population, for it would condemn them to moral, intellectual and material stagnation, and experience has shown that to keep the African races on the path of progress the constant stimulus of contact with European races is essential. When that influence is withdrawn retrogression is rapid and certain.

Ambitious Natives

"We cannot, however, prevent the ambitious and advanced natives from desiring to emancipate themselves from the control of their chiefs and from forsaking the stagnant communal life of the kraal for a life of greater independence and opportunity. It is to their advantage and to the advantage of their country generally that natives shall leave their reserves and work under Europeans on farms and mines. Yet there is no royal road to a solution of the difficulties and problems. So justice, sympathy and common-sense, firmly and consistently applied, are the only means by which a modus vivendi can be established."

DEMANDS MADE SUMS OF MONEY

Seventeen Year Old Boy Wrote Letters to Rich People With Menacing Suggestions

LONDON, Aug. 9. — At the Central Criminal Court before Mr. Justice Salter, Joseph Arthus Bernard Fisher, 17, cashier, pleaded guilty to sending letters to Lady Townshend, Lord Churston and Eric Hamilton Rose demanding £5,000 from each of them with menaces and without reasonable or probable cause.

Foolish Joke

Sir Travers Humphreys said the prisoner was an articled pupil to a firm of auctioneers in Oxford. He appeared to have spent his spare time in writing to various persons, whose names he got out of a directory, demanding that they should send a sum of money, or, if they did not, he would kidnap their sons. The case differed from an ordinary one of demanding money with menaces, because the prisoner did not appear to have attempted to get any money for himself, his suggestion being that the money should be sent to a charity and acknowledged in a newspaper. What the prisoner had done had been to cause some intense pain, as well as annoyance and trouble, to people, and it was solely for the purpose of advertising himself and obtaining notoriety. The prisoner had himself said: "I had no intention of harming anyone. It was a foolish practical joke to make a sensation." The prison doctor had made a report that the prisoner had no sign of insanity, and he described him as a vain and foolish youth and said that he felt satisfaction at having made a stir in the world.

Technical Offense

Richard O'Sullivan, addressing Mr. Justice Salter on behalf of the prisoner, said he had pleaded guilty to the technical offence of demanding money, but without any view of getting a penny piece for himself. The letters were signed "British Communist," but it was only fair to state that he had no connexion with the Communist party. The doctor's report was that the prisoner had evidently been unreasonably pampered and encouraged to believe himself exceptionally talented. The prisoner was grandson of a canon of Norwich, and his father was a music master. An uncle of the prisoner was Archdeacon of Chesterfield, and he was prepared to take the sole custody of the prisoner for 12 months. In conclusion, counsel said the prisoner desired to repeat his expression of sorrow for the anxiety he had caused to others.

Devilish Cruelty

Mr. Justice Salter said that his case showed the depth of devilish cruelty to which a person might go from mere conceit. This was the result of sensational literature and a craze for newspaper notoriety. He thought it was expedient that the prisoner should have some further experience of prison discipline and an opportunity to reflect on his dastardly conduct towards people who had done him no harm, and he therefore should postpone sentence until the next session.

The further taking of evidence in the city police court in the preliminary hearing of Hagbert Hansen, charged with the theft of $4,000 from the Canadian Fish & Cold Storage Company, before Magistrate McLeod, was adjourned until 2.30 o'clock this afternoon owing to sickness in the family of Provincial Constable J. Smith, court stenographer.
