GOVERNMENT MILL—The Big River Utilization mill, owned by the Saskatchewan government, produces up to 8,000,000 board feet of lumber a year. Opened in June, 1951, the mill 90 miles northwest of Prince Albert, is in the heart of the province's $6,000,000 lumbering industry. Life With Indians, Eskimos Enjoyed by Doctor's Wife

EDMONTON (CP)—A woman who spent almost a year among the Eskimos says they were cautious at first about accepting dental services, but when they found they were free and not compulsory, the Eskimos flocked to have their teeth examined.

Mrs. J. T. Hunt, the former Miss Bonnie Kinneard, went north with her husband who is employed by the federal government to perform dental work among northern natives.

She has just returned after nine months in the Northwest Territories. She found that while life in the unsettled wilds is rugged, it is also filled with adventure and excitement.

Dr. and Mrs. Hunt visited about 15 villages, spending about three weeks in each settlement.

"Accommodation everywhere was limited," said Mrs. Hunt in an interview. "And we generally stayed just wherever we could set up our equipment."

Dr. Hunt found that Indians and Eskimos who subsist exclusively on native foods have much better teeth than those whose diets are varied with white man's food. He said the natives are very fond of candy.

"Over 5,000 pounds of candy have been purchased by native inhabitants of the Aklavik district during the last year," he said.

Trips from outpost to outpost usually were made by plane but Mrs. Hunt made one 20-mile journey by dogsled from Fort McPherson to an Indian camp.

Edmonton-born Mrs. Hunt did not find that the northern climate differed radically from winter temperatures to which she had been accustomed.

"The temperature sometimes dropped as low as 60 below," she commented, "but it isn't difficult to get used to the extreme cold."

She described the midnight sun as wonderful.

"The sun dips down toward the horizon at times but never goes completely below," she added.

Mrs. Hunt noted that Eskimos do not live in igloos all year. Only during the sealing season, a period of about three months, do they move to the ice and erect snow houses.

U.S.-Canada in Joint Operation Of Small Arctic Weather Posts

OTTAWA (CP)—Canada and the United States have agreed to continue joint operation of the half-dozen weather stations which dot the Arctic and send from the "weather-factory" of the north reports that make long-range forecasting possible.

Canada began establishing the stations in 1947 under a five-year plan to operate and supply them jointly with the United States. Now there are six such stations spread across the islands of the Arctic Archipelago, but the five-year term for joint operation has expired.

A spokesman for the Transport Department said recently that while it was Canada's ultimate intention to take full responsibility for the stations, the joint arrangement is being continued indefinitely. Weather experts, assessing the work of the stations, have decided their meteorological data are vital.

Most northerly station, named Alert, is situated on the northern tip of Ellesmere Island, just 65- miles from the north pole. Station Eureka is at the southern tip of the same island. Another may be set up on Ellesmere soon.

Then there is station Resolute on Cornwallis Island, station Isachsen on Ellefringnes Island, Mould Bay on Prince Patrick Island and Cambridge on Victoria Island.

Joint Canadian and American meteorologists and crews—averaging five to seven to a station—man the outposts, sending in reports to central points by radio.

They lead a lonely existence. They get special greetings by radio at Christmas but spring is the big time of the year for them. It is then that two icebreakers and a supply ship make the treacherous trip to bring in supplies. RCAF Lancasters from the east coast help this force by flying an ice-patrol for the ships.

The ships attempt to reach as many stations as possible. If ice prevents a station being reached, the supplies are landed at the "mother" station at Resolute and then airlifted in jointly by RCAF and American planes. Supplies are usually dropped by parachute.

Canada originally announced she would build nine such weather stations in the north.
