OLD PHOENIX DESOLATE NOW

Only Four Residents Today in Once Flourishing Boundary Mining Camp.

While in the southern interior recently attending the convention of the Union of British Columbia Municipalities at Trail, City Treasurer D. J. Matheson took occasion to pay a brief visit to the old mining camp of Phoenix, near Greenwood, where he was once city clerk and at another time mayor. In the heydey of mining activity in the Boundary country some twenty-five years ago Phoenix boasted a population of several thousand people. Today there are only four men there. The rails of the Canadian Pacific and Great Northern Railways, which once served the place have long since been taken up and, with even the post office closed for many years and not a single store in operation, the old camp, where not a few people now in Prince Rupert once lived, is a scene of pathetic desolation with old buildings gradually falling into their own ruins and hundreds of empty houses.

The only activity now going on at Phoenix, in which the present four men residents are engaged, is the moving of ore off the old dumps for smelting at Trail. The ore is taken five miles down the hill by motor truck to Greenwood and thence shipped east to Trail on the railway.

The only resident of the old days still at Phoenix is Dan Forpaw, who was a miner in the early days and who remains there in the capacity of a watchman.
