India Jealously Guards Timber—Conservation is Big Problem

India takes forest farming as seriously as the average greenhouse gardener looks after his plants in Canada and every stick of timber is recorded and "counter-checked."

On a six-month tour of Canada, S. H. Mahalaha, deputy conservator of forests for the government of India in Jabalpur (a position corresponding to district forester here) said today that "there is no waste land, nor a waste tree of any kind in India" and he looked wistfully at the timber-clad mountains nearby.

"Our difficulty is not in finding means to log our timber, but to conserve it."

Yet, India is one of the first countries in the world to have inaugurated a system of scientific forest management, which began as early as 1862.

And following the Waste Land Rules Act, 1879, a workable plan of sustained yield forest farming was developed.

Mr. Mahalaha's area, as deputy conservator, is comprised of 22 districts in the province of Madhya Pradesh ((former Central Provinces) which is covered 46 per cent by timber, the heaviest-forested area in India.

All forest lands in India are owned and managed by the state and perhaps no other laws are so stringent than those covering the logging industry.

Reason that there is no unmarketable forest product is simple, says Mr. Hahalaha, "when you consider that electricity is so high in cost the average person cannot use it for heating and cooking."

Forest growth, therefore, which is not used in building, is widely used for firewood and charcoal fuel.

AUCTIONS KEEN

This closely regimented system of forest manegement introduced in India also a "by-product" which is now famous throughout the world and a source of great competition. It is the yearly timber auction,one of which is held each July in every forest district of the country.

After two months of regular advertising in all Indian newspapers the timber areas offered for sale, the parcels of land on which "every big and little tree" has been marked and counted, go on the auction block.

"An average of 500 bidders and as many as 1000 attend each auction," says Mahalaha.

Every prospective bidder is required to make a deposit of $100 as a surety, before he is allowed to bid. The upset price of the forest tracts are not known to the bidder. The bidding is very furious and the sometimes fabulous transactions that are made in a breath attract huge crowds of onlookers.

"In most cases, these auction days are made municipal holidays," says Mahalaha.

When the contractor obtains his forest tract, he will find that every tree has been marked, showing which can be cut, and which must not be cut. "Forbidden" trees in this selective cutting system, are clearly identified with a brightly painted ring around the tree.

MUST KEEP LAW

is carried out according to the Periodical checks are made by forest rangers to see that logging is carried out according to the letter of the law. As all timber is counter-checked in record books, it is a simple matter, relatively, to see whether or not a "forbidden" tree has been cut.

If an offender is found, he will be given a warning. Second offence is still subject only to a warning, if a "reasonable" excuse is given.

"If the rules are broken deliberately, however, the offender is punished." And this means either a $500 fine in minor cases and a "blacklisting" in severe cases. Those on the blacklist can never again do any logging in India.

Mahalaha, who arrived at Montreal two months ago, is a representative travelling under the Colombo Plan of Technical Assistance, which in turn, is under the auspices of the United Nations. The one thing which has most impressed him since coming to Canada, "is the wonderful co-operation I receive wherever I go."

"You people are very kind. I am waited on hand and foot."

The Indian forester arrived in Prince Rupert from Queen Charlotte Islands with David Monk, public relations officer of the B.C. Forestry Department, and made a special tour of the Columbia Cellulose Co. pulp mill and the Kitsumkalum River and Khutzmanteen logging areas. They left today for Prince George and other interior points to visit logging and sawmill operations.

Later he will tour southern interior areas in company with Eric Druce, another Forest Branch public relations officer.
