Orientals Driving Whites and Indians Out of Industry Says Delegate in Washington House

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8.—A picture of the distressed condition of Indian and white independent fishermen of Alaska was portrayed in the House of Representatives yesterday by Delegate Dan Sutherland in making a plea for Alaskan control of salmon fishing. A virtual monopoly, he said, had been granted the large canning interests. This condition had been responsible, he declared, for an exodus of twenty thousand white people from the territory during the last twenty years. The condition was one which also brought abject poverty to the Indians. The importation of Chinese and Phillipine labor to aid in fishing and in the canneries was assailed by Delegate Sutherland as depriving the Indians and whites of almost all opportunities for work.

The delegate also charged that representatives of the fishing and canning industries kept congressional representatives and other important delegations from learning the true conditions.

Sutherland assailed the Bureau of Fisheries as "favoring" canneries and fishing interests and with having given them "the heritage of the Indian" which they were instructed to protect. Now fewer fish were being caught than before the conservation program had been enacted, he said.

Most of Pacific Coast Outlet For Peace River District Is Already Built, Editor States

Peace River needs a route to the Orient, but that does not mean that a Pacific Ocean must be made to give such a route, writes Charles W. Frederick, publisher of the Grande Prairie Herald. Peace River requires an outlet to the Pacific Coast, but that does not mean that a new line of railway must be built the entire distance from Peace River to tidewater. Most of it is already built. When some people and some newspapers mention the subject of a proposed coast outlet for the Peace River country it is in terms which indicate a belief that some gigantic undertaking is proposed, involving immense construction programs of a thousand miles or more of railway over all but insurmountable mountain ranges. What the Peace country actually requires is the construction of 360 miles of railway along a water grade to connect presently constructed or projected lines of railway to complete a new and shorter route to tidewater.

The program of the Northern Alberta Railway calls for construction westwards as far as Hudson Hope, where this northern rail system must go for its coal supply. From Hudson Hope to Hazelton by the route a railway would need to take is a distance of 360 miles. This route has already been surveyed by an engineer employed by one of the large railway systems and found entirely practicable and feasible. This same engineer has made an estimate
