GREAT BRITISH HERO HAS GONE TO HIS REST

Recent Death of Lord Wolseley and Comparison of His Career with Lord Roberts.

The name of Lord Wolseley and Lord Roberts are associated in the minds of the British people as the two greatest military commanders of their country and generation. Lord Roberts seems to have possessed more of those qualities which win for a commander the personal affection of the soldiers and the people.

The careers of Lord Wolseley and Lord Roberts were curiously parallel. Both were born in the army, the sons of distinguished officers. Lord Roberts was one year the elder, and joined an artillery corps one year before the other joined the infantry.

General Wolseley was called to the Lords as Viscount in 1885 after his service in Egypt. Lord Roberts was made Baron in 1892 and Viscount and Earl in 1901 after South Africa.

But his chief literary work, like that of Lord Roberts, is his own reminiscences called "The Story of My Life," written during the first years of his retirement. This is a modest personal record but from the nature of the case it is almost a military history of Great Britain for the period that it covers.

Lord Wolseley's military career in Canada, which included service in the Fenian Rebellion and in the first Reil trouble, made him familiar with this country and its military problems. When he led his force to Fort Garry he was not allowed to go by the United States, and so had to use the waterways and portages between Lake Superior and the Red River.
