Sport Chat

A dozen experts for the last six months have been compiling the "fingerprints" of thousands of racehorses on which Britons will win and lose money during this season which opened Easter Monday. Some of the recognition experts have been doing their job for more than half a century. They make up charts containing dots, crosses, and long and short strokes into a series of hieroglyphic signs which enable the expert eye to identify each of the 5,000 or 6,000 horses running every normal year. By the identified markings, together with the horse's coloring, every animal can be identified just as surely as Scotland Yard can identify a person by fingerprints. Each of these spotters has a copy of the annual "Horses in Training," containing the name of every horse, with age, sex and color. Besides each name the spotter adds the distinguishing sign. In these signs a cross represents a patch of white found on most racers' foreheads. A dot stands for a small patch and a long stroke for a blaze. Dots and strokes at each end of a horizontal line represent small or large white patches on the fore and hind legs, and the horizontal line represents the horse himself. One of the spotters is 76-year old Bob Brook. He has been able to identify every one of the 30,000 horses which have galloped past him on Newmarket Heath whether in line or clustered together for a fast gallop. A spotter of Bob's ability can identify through field glasses any horse up to two miles away on a clear day.
