Wolves Gobble Poisoned Bait

PRINCE ALBERT (CP) — The death knell is being tolled on northern Saskatchewan's predatory wolf packs.

After years of unsuccessful combat against the wolves, the Saskatchewan game department last winter introduced poisoned bait. The result — 154 dead wolves. The surprising thing was the wolves liked the poisoned bait. They gobbled it up.

Harold Read, game supervisor at Prince Albert, announced some of the findings after the winter-long campaign against the animals.

He found that of the 41 bait stations set up the most effective were in the path of migrating caribou. Those outside the area accounted for only a few wolves.

In the caribou area 17 wolves were killed at one station and the average "take" was nine.

It was thougt that wolves would shy away from the cyanide-and-strychnine-poisoned bait, but this was unfounded.

"The wolves rubbed up against the trees, often chewed off and played with the warning signs and literally gulped down the baits," Mr. Read said.

The annual toll of caribou, deer, elk and moose killed by wolves has been placed as high as 50,000. Provincial game officials are considering poison campaigns every winter.

Artificial Lens Restore Woman's Sight

VANCOUVER — An artificial lens, made of plastic and smaller than an aspirin tablet, has restored the sight of a woman here.

Blinded by cataracts in both eyes for 10 years, Mrs. M. Boert, 57, of Enderby, B.C., underwent the first-known operation of its kind in North America, it was reported Saturday by surgeons at Vancouver General Hospital.

The artificial lens was placed inside her left eye after it was molded to the same shape as her natural lens.

"I can see my daughter's features for the first time in 10 years," said Mrs. Boert now staying at the home of the daughter in Vancouver.

"Now I can hardly wait to see my other four children."

Surgeons here followed the technique evolved by Dr. Harold Ridley of London. He has performed 25 such operations in England.

Prior to the operations, Mrs. Bogert was able to distinguish between light and dark, but that was all.

Counting Points Is Only One Guide For Play

Surely you've heard these plaintive words from your partner: "How could I go on? I had a bare minimum opening" or "I couldn't try for a slam. I only had twelve points."

Points, he says. As if points were everything, and you could leave your brain at home! If point counting alone were the whole story, everybody would be a master player.

Counting honor tricks or points are good guides for opening a hand or for determining how high to go at no trump. But after that, listen to your partner. Visualize his distribution.

Decide whether the two hands fit—that is, whether your partner's strength is so placed that it will be of maximum value to you. Some call it plastic valuation and some call it common sense. Take your choice.

Mr. Muzzy would have passed today's hand out at four hearts. He would have pointed out that his hand was a rock-bottom minimum opening. And Mr. Dale would have to agree with that statement. But he took an entirely different view of the situation.

He didn't feel too optimistic until he heard his partner's four heart bid. Then the picture was complete. Mr. Masters had bid two suits and raised the un-rebid hearts to game.

How could he have more than one spade? And his three club bid had taken the curse off those three quick club losers in Mr. Dale's hand. The king of diamonds, of doubtful value at the start, took on tremendous importance after Mr. Master's two diamond bid.

Considering all these favorable factors, Mr. Dale properly decided to forget he had opened a minimum.

He won the opening spade lead with the ace, cashed the king of diamonds, cashed the other high club and ruffed a club in his hand.

He ruffed a spade with the eight of hearts and proceeded to cross-ruff spades and diamonds, taking the precaution of ruffing high in each hand from this point on, to prevent an opponent from over-ruffing with the ten and firing a trump.

Mr. Abel finally won a trick with the 10 of hearts but that was the only trick his side got.
