of Prince Rupert and had more and better equipment.

In addition, Mr. Wilmot said, while the 12-man fire department here was large enough to fight most major fires, onlooker-volunteers were still used at fires.

RETROGRESSIVE STEP

Mr. Lester, labelling the instituting of volunteers a retrogressive step, traced the growth of fire department back to the Great Fire in London in 1666. He said that small towns usually started with volunteer brigades but as the town became a city, so the volunteers were replaced by professional firemen.

Since a professional firemen depended on his training for his livelihood, he was more dependable than a man who fought fires only part of the time Mr. Lester said. Professional firemen had to go to fires and they had to know their duties, Mr. Lester explained. Volunteers were not bound so severely to and their absence from a fire could not be disciplined in a manner applied to professional firemen.

While cost of maintaining a paid fire department were high insurance rates were lower where professional departments were used, the speaker said.

FALSE ECONOMY

To think only of costs was false economy if the maintenance of a professional fire department meant the prevention of loss of life, Mr. Lester concluded.

In a discussion among the panellists, the affirmative side pointed out that in 1953, Prince Rupert, representing 8,500 people, had a fire protection cost equal to that of both Nanaimo and Port Alberni combined. However, the negative side countered by explaining that since then both Nanaimo and Vernon had asked for an additional five paid firemen while Prince George were seeking three new professional firemen.

Many fires and many fire hazards were prevented from becoming major conflagrations through prompt arrival at the scene by a professional department in the "all-important" first one or two minutes of a blaze, paid department supporters said.

But fire underwriters, still felt that centres with volunteer departments had the fire protection situation well in hand, the other side pointed out.

BOTH SIDES IMMOVABLE

Pro and con questions were directed to forum members during a 45-minute question period which followed the panel discussion, with both sides maintaining an immovable position as long as the argument was kept to the extremes of a fully paid or a fully volunteer organization.

Initial forum was introduced by John Robertson, Civic Centre Association director, who said that in subsequent weeks the adult participation program might take the form of a quiz, forum, or panel discussion.

On behalf of the CAA, Mrs. E. W. Becker, group president, thanked the speakers.

Seabiscuit, the ugly duckling of the turf, defeated War Admiral, son of Man o'War, at Pimlico racetrack 18 years ago in one of racing's most famous contests. Seabiscuit was the top money-winner of 1937 with a total of $168,580 in purses.

"Parents would gain insight, if newspapers described what goes on in juvenile courts," says Judge Emerson J. Heaney of Winnipeg's Juvenile Court. "Names, no. But for boys deposed to be delinquent, a few grim facts and figures might make them think they had better not."

But perhaps the most novel view on combatting boy delinquency comes from Ben Solomon, social worker at the Columbia University. He says:

"Studying the causes of delinquency is the most fruitless enterprise in the world. There are hundreds of causes. And the same cause that leads one child into delinquency will spur another toward high goals and success. It's the inner strength of the child that, in the final analysis, decides whether he'll become delinquent. The child chooses himself.

"We must keep him busy in school and playground, until he is old enough to make up his mind the right way. To keep him busy, we have to get him into our organized activity. That means being ready to take the roughnecks, half-wits, the dumbbells, into our clubs, play their kind of games, sing their kind of songs.

"If he won't come to our recreation centres—and he won't—go and play on his streets with him. Take a mobile unit with baseball equipment, right into his neighborhood."
