The high school which I visited is one of those which have actually used the simplified system of ideographs or symbols which the present government is trying to introduce throughout China, to make reading and writing easier for the masses.

MUST SPEAK RUSSIAN

All upper school students — that is in the final three years of high school—must take Russian. But English also is due to be made compulsory soon, first for the upper school and then for the lower school.

There are no school fees, but students must pay a small charge per term for sundries. They must also provide their own books.

The system is working well—at least in the one school I visited. The most popular reform introduced to date is that the school teachers' union "took over" all of the accumulated "old debts" of the school teachers, who formerly found it impossible to live on their low salaries.

By "old debts" they tell men they mean the debts which predate the revolution—pardon me—I must remember that it is frightfully bad manners to say anything but "liberation" in the New China.
