FUTURE OF ATLIN

hydro-power project. Survey parties have been around here all summer. In fact, the last one is just leaving now.

"It is difficult to say just what this will mean for Atlin but undoubtedly it will increase the value of any mineral discoveries made around here. In fact, the place is jumping with prospectors right now who are trying to get in ahead of the game. They come in by plane, helicopter and even on foot. A few promising claims have been staked but so far I don't think anything sensational has happened."

One thing the Frobisher project will mean to Atlin is removal of the entire town to a higher point on the shoreline. The first stage of the project will raise the level of the lake, but not to an extent that will affect any buildings except those close to the water.

However, the second stage which involves reversing the flow of the Yukon headwaters so that they pour into the lake, will flood a wide area. By then Lake Atlin, already 90 miles long, will become a veritable inland sea. The place that is now Atlin will be under about 30 feet of water. But those planning the project recently held public hearings for the townspeople and were assured the community would not stand in the way of progress provided, of course, satisfactory property settlements could be made.

SHARP CONTRAST

Perhaps to a greater degree than anything else happening in northern B.C., the proposed power development brings into sharp contrast the north as it was and the north as it is expected to be. Everywhere around the town, and particularly along the banks of Spruce Creek which in its time has swept millions of dollars worth of nuggets into the waiting pans of prospectors, the visitors saw evidence of the passing lure of gold. Enormous mounds of upturned earth were left behind as men dug deep to reach the bedrock where the gold lay thickest.

Close to Pine Creek, less productive than its fellow stream but rich in gold all the same, the visitors saw the ghost town of Discovery. In its hey-day at the turn of the century, Discovery had a population of 5,000. Now two old men live there, one a pensioner and the other a prospector who still pans for gold in the creek. Crumbling dance-halls and bars, and several mansion-like houses falling into ruin, are decaying signs of the high and expensive living that once reigned there.

MOVE MOST AMBITIOUS

If and when the power project gets underway (apparently there is still a question of whether to seek an outlet through the Alaska Panhandle or to transmit power to a point south of the Panhandle), the aging scene will become a backdrop to one of the most ambitious industrial undertakings of modern history. Thousands of men and untold quantities of equipment will move in to create a metallurgical empire that will influence the economy of the entire province.

Meanwhile, as the visitors learned that night at a meeting of the board of trade, Atlin has more immediate problems to consider. President Bruce Morton listed three of them. The town needs road connections with the interior of the province, preferably along route "A." For communications with the outside, it depends on a radio-telegraph service with Whitehorse that frequently fades out. It has no hospital except its Red Cross outpost, and patients needing hospital attention must proceed 120 miles north to Whitehorse. An added complication of this is that the people of Atlin do not receive the benefits of the B. C. Hospital Insurance Service even though they are contributing by means of the sales tax.

HAPPY DESPITE DRAWBACKS

At the meeting, the visitors became aware of the fact that the people of Atlin must suffer many penalties because of their isolation. Yet they are cheerful and hospitable, and for the most part they are determined to stay with their town until better days are reached.

"We are pleased you are here, not only because we appreciate your interest but also because we like to have this opportunity of findng out what is going on in your part of thep rovince," Mr. Morton said in his welcome. "As time goes on, we believe we will have much more in common with you than is now the case."

On their part, the visitors promised to do what they could in helping Atlin with its problems through the medium of their associated boards of trade of central British Columbia.

ALWAYS CAME BACK

In the course of this visit to Atlin, Frank Henning answered the question of what prompts men to stay in such a remote northern community. He was well qualifed to speak on the subject because his mother and father trekked there in 1899 over the Chilkoot Pass just two months before he was born. Mr. Henning, tall, distinguished looking operator of a transportation business, has tried living elsewhere but could never forget Atlin as his home.

"As far as I'm concerned, there is no other place to live," he said. "This is my country. I like the smell of it and the looks of it. Besides, the little things you worry about in other places don't seem so important up here. The country is so big that somehow those things seem to take care of themselves."

LASTING WEALTH FOUND

That night a yellow moon hung over Lake Atlin and threw a light on the massive, changeless mountains. In that setting, men like Frank Henning had found a wealth more lasting and real than gold. As the visitors went aboard their plane the next morning, some of this had been imparted to them even in so short a stay. Pilot Barran rammed his throttles ahead for the short take-off, and the engines roared their message to the hills. But it was a small, weak thing compared to the big silence of the north country in which some have discovered a secret that for them holds an answer to life.
