BLACKWOOD on BRIDGE

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

Champion and Champion Make Unbeatable Team

"If I had myself for a partner, I'd be unbeatable," proclaimed Mr. Champion, modestly. Nobody paid any attention to this routine remark from the great man.

He was referring to the fact that he had made a fine defensive play but Mr. Muzzy had loused it up and let Mr. Dale make his contract anyway.

Incidentally, this deal illustrates the wisdom of playing your best, even with an apparently hopeless hand like Mr. Champion held today. When Mr. Muzzy opened the king of spades, many players would carelessly follow suit with the deuce from the East hand.

After all, why should you encourage the continuation of the suit? You have no honor in it and you can't ruff the third round.

But Mr. Champion's thinking went a little farther than that. He saw a way to make his king of diamonds—if Mr. Muzzy would seem to be marked for sudden death since Mr. Dale had bid diamonds so strongly.

No doubt Mr. Dale could enter dummy with either a heart or a club and pull the 10 of diamonds through.

That would be the end of the king. But what if it could be arranged for Mr. Dale to have only one trump on the board? Then he could finesse just once against the king of diamonds—and Mr. Champion would still have the king amply guarded.

With this plan in mind, Mr. Champion screamed for continuation of spades by playing his eight spot on the first trick. He completed the echo by playing the deuce on his partner's queen at trick two.

Now, if Mr. Muzzy had continued with his third high spade, Mr. Dale would have been forced to ruff on the board or accept immediate defeat. And after that the king of diamonds would have been a sure winner.

But no. Mr. Muzzy had other ideas. At trick three he shifted to a heart—and Mr. Dale won the balance of the tricks.

Mr. Champion was beside himself. "Why didn't you lead a third spade?" he bellowed. "Didn't you see my eight spot?"

"What eight spot?" mumbled Mr. Muzzy, confusedly.

It was here that Mr. Champion expressed the preference for himself as a partner.
