Andrews Sitting Pretty As 3-1 Gamble Pays Off

Dana Andrews is no horse, as his movie fans well know, but Andrews was once the basis for a big money bet, a bet that paid off at better than 3 to 1.

Andrews is a firm believer in opportunity. "Everybody gets at least one big chance," he said the other day, "but you've got to be ready when Lady Luck crooks her finger."

Andrews was ready. He was working in a Los Angeles gas station, and studying grand opera at night—he started out to be a singer—when he got his first big break.

Dana's boss owned a string of filling stations and was a promoter by nature. He knew that Dana was taking singing lessons with an eye to breaking into movies (Dana had quit a big paying job as a Texas oil company accountant to make the assault on Hollywood) and he thought the youngster had talent.

One day he made Dana a proposition: that the boy leave the gas station. The boss promised to pay Dana $50 a week until he got his break in pictures; Andrews thought this might take about six or eight months.

In return for the cash advance, Dana promised (although no contract was drawn up) 15 per cent of his earnings from his movie work—when he got his break. Also, he had to promise to give up singing.

"A second string actor makes a lot more money than a second rate singer," his boss told him succinctly, being advised in this opinion by a friend of his wife, the then famous actress Pauline Lord.

Being an energetic fellow, Andrews did not give up his opera lessons—he was then a baritone—but bootlegged them while studying acting and performing in amateur plays.

At the end of the first six months his boss told him not to worry about the $50 a week—he'd keep it up until Dana got his break. "You're doing great kid," he told young Andrews, who might have had some doubts on occasion.

Dana kept on studying and trying for three full years. Toward the end of that period, he got a job with the famed Pasadena Playhouse and from there to movies was a hop, skip and jump.

"My boss advanced me $7,500 over a three-year period," Andrews recalled. "He was a gambler. He knew I was ambitious, trying to get into movies and he thought I had talent. Of course, he got paid back and with interest. Fifteen per cent of my first three years' movie earnings came to $25,000."

Two days after Dana made his last payment his ex-boss died.

"I'm glad he lived to collect every dime," Dana said. "It was a real thrill to him to have a long shot come in and pay off at better than 3 to 1."

His gamble also paid off for Dana, no doubt about it. Our hero is now playing opposite gorgeous Greer Garson in "Strange Lady in Town." Directed by Mervyn LeRoy as the first of LeRoy's Warner Bros. productions under his new long-term contract, "Strange Lady in Town," is the story of a lone Eastern lady in a Western frontier town. Andrews and Miss Garson are the stars of the picture which is now being released.
