The "OLD SWEAT" - by Doug Smith

The Canadian serviceman abroad was the world's greatest souvenir hunter. In his travels he picked up thousands of useless things and discarded them just as quickly.

I remember a small house in Normandy just up the beach a way from Courseulles. The French family had vamoosed and were hiding in the caves along the coast. They had left most of their furnishings behind. Here a sewing machine, there some English-made clocks and a gramaphone and pictures, usually of family groups.

A surprising number of good books came to light. You must bear in mind that these were not the homes of lawyers, doctors or intellectuals as we know them, but of workingmen. Volumes of Voltaire, Dumas, Daudet and English classics were commonplace.

It is funny what a little thing can do to turn people's thoughts. We were all set to loot the joint, pick up whatever could be used and many things not usable. And then the one thing happened.

I was browsing through a book, waiting for the tanks to go ahead and flay the minefields. It was a schoolgirl's book, "Anne of Green Gables" and printed in English. On the flyleaf was written, "To Marie, with love, from her pen pal, Ruth of Ealing."

Reading that friendly little inscription, with three grimy soldiers looking over your shoulder gave you a feeling of homesickness. We wondered where little Marie could be and thought about the unknown Ruth in faraway Ealing.

That little inscription shocked us. Up to then, the houses and absent people had been abstract things. They had no real meaning. No purpose in our thinking. Suddenly, we felt ashamed of ourselves as intruders. Here were shattered houses, scattered families. And here we were, strangers poking through the little private sticks and pieces that make up one's home. That was no good.

Outside, the clanking of the tanks became louder. Silently we filed outside and followed in their tracks . . . emptyhanded.

MAN OF TALENT

Sir William Herschel, great British astronomer who died in 1822, was educated as a professional musician.
