BLACKWOOD on BRIDGE

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

"WHAT a play," raved Mr. New, the avid kibitzer, when his idol, Mr. Masters rolled home nine tricks on this hand.

The opening lead was the six of hearts and Mr. Abel's king fell to the ace in the closed hand. After a few moment's thought, Mr. Masters cased the ace of spades, then led the trey and went right up with dummy's king. This dropped the queen and all he had to do now was to knock out the queen of hearts to set up a second trick in that suit. Thus he won three spade tricks and two tricks in each of the other suits.

"How could you know that Abel had the queen doubleton of spades?" asked Mr. New.

"I didn't know it," Mr. Masters replied, "I didn't even suspect it. It's just that the play of the king on the second round was the best percentage on the hand.

Pressed for more details, Mr. Masters continued: "I saw that Mrs. Keen could prevent me from winning more than two heart tricks and I noted that I could not possibly win more than four tricks in clubs and diamonds. That meant I had to win three spades or lose the contract.

"Now if Abel had four or more spades to the queen I was probably sunk. But consider this . . . If I took a second round finesse of the jack and lost to a doubleton queen, that would be just as disastrous. In that case Mrs. Keen would have the suit stopped again and I would be held to two spade winners. I had to guard against that set-up, hence the safety play."

"What if the queen hadn't dropped under the king?" Mr. New wanted to know.

"Then I returned to my hand with the king of clubs or diamonds, Mr. Masters explained, "and lead another spade up toward the jack. Now if Mrs. Keen started with the queen or if the suit breaks 3-3 I will make three spade tricks."

"Of course if Mrs. Keen had started out with exactly three spades to the queen," Mr. New pointed out, "then the finesse of the jack on the second round would have given you 10 tricks."

"My boy," said Mr. Masters, smiling, "in my opinion, the only time to play a hand wide-open for four odd is when you're IN four."

Army's outstretched hand lends support to needy

A well dressed, alert young man sat in the Salvation Army headquarters in Prince Rupert. He had come because he was interested in a lad, just out of jail, whom the Senior Captain T. H. Smith was helping to re-establish.

"You don't remember me, do you Captain?" said the young man.

"You will, when I remind you that just a few short years ago I was in jail. On Mother's Day you had a meeting there. I asked if you would take a plant to my mother."

At once Sr. Capt. Smith stretched out his hand to clasp that of the ex-prisoner.

"Certainly I remember you. It was a pleasure to visit your mother that day and take the flowers for the son for whom she was praying. I am more than glad to see you."

The caller told the Salvation Army Officer that he was now married; had a good home and children and a steady job.

He had never forgotten the captain's words which had been endorsed by kind and prompt action. It had made all the difference to his life, and he was deeply grateful, he said.

Now he was wanting to help another lad in trouble, just as he himself had been helped by the Capt. Smith.

Captain Smith said today that the incident was just one of many real life stories being enacted daily across the nation and Prince Rupert.

The public will be asked to open its purse-strings Monday night to support this work of the Salvation Army.

Unions warned public fed up

VANCOUVER (?)—Labor Minister Lyle Wicks has warned unions that public pressure is growing for compulsory arbitration in labor disputes.

"No government can ignore the public's opinion," he said, "and remain the government."

The minister, speaking to the opening session of Western District, Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers Union, said labor unrest in the last nine months has brought "growing impatience from the public with the means of settling disputes, and a growing cry for compulsory settlements."

He added: "If the day comes when someone has to bring into B.C. a system of settlement repugnant to democracy, the mine-mill union won't have contributed to that move."

"Unless the unrest subsides, it is obvious the people will demand changes and any government must be responsive to public opinion."
