and Bessie Pyper, at the Port Clements Hotel.

This easy-going hamlet of some 100 people is the most westerly port in Canada. It has a good dock on Masset Inlet, which is a sizeable inland sea. Freight and passenger boats no longer call here, but fishing vessels move back and forth at times between here and Massett.

Until last summer the only transportation between the two towns was by water. Now the road is through, and this is the mid-point on the journey south to Queen Charlotte City. Most travellers drop in for a beer on the way through and quite a number of people drive down here especially to pick up a few cases, because there is no liquor store or tavern north of here.

Port Clements is probably the most comfortable location on the islands; peaceful and fairly sheltered, yet accessible by land and water.

Until recently the atmosphere was one of gentle decay. The population was—and still is—composed largely of retired folk. Many of the grey, weatherbeaten buildings has a list to port or starboard.

But a small current of new life is stirring through the town. The local public works headquarters is now here. Oil drilling crews are not many miles away. A road is being built here from the big logging camp of Juskatla.

There isn't a vacant house now in old Port Clements. Once there were great hopes for the town and surrounding area. Some 2,000 settlers gathered about here. But they were defeated by the sour muskeg and the impossibility of transporting and selling crops.

I noticed two new log houses in the town, one built, the other under construction. There are no sawmills of any size on the island, and it is actually cheaper to build houses of logs. Personally I like log houses better, too.

Time and Place

he had a Native wife. He made and burned all the charcoal for the soldering stoves in the cannery, from an alder patch, which he had, up the river. All the old bachelors had alarm clocks to wake them at the time the tide was out, so that they could go clam digging. Old Charcoal said he did not need an alarm clock, as his old wife always woke up at the right time, and furthermore she did all the digging, and he got more sleep.

Some miles up river was the village of Greenville. This was a community of Indian peoples, presided over by the famous Methodist minister Dr. Osterhout. The doctor was also a justice of the peace. He used to take odd trips down the river to Nass Harbor to straighten out any squabbles that the provincial constable, Mr. Spain, had stored up for his visit, and he usually slapped on a few fines when holding court, in the school house.

On one occasion the good doctor fined the prisoner for drinking, continued the questioning, and ended up fining all the witnesses and even the Indian constable. When finally there was nobody else to fine he looked up and noticed the Provincial Constable was not in the Court room. He walked to the front door, and there found Mr. Spain pacing up and down the sidewalk, the Doctor asked him why he had left the court when in session, and told him it was really contempt of court. "Well," said Mr. Spain, "You fined the prisoner, the Indian constable, and all the witnesses, and I was afraid you might get around to fining the provincial constable—so I got out."

In those days we never heard of "Canyon City"—this must be a new village of modern construction.

Up above stood Aiyansh, presided over by the Rev. John McClough, a Church of England sky-pilot. Mr. McClough had formerly been an army officer in the Indian Army, and his village was pretty much regimented. He taught his people all kinds of trades and music, and gave them a good schooling. He ruled with an iron rod. He built a jail, or Skookem House and he was the judge. He tried all the cases, and often committed the culprits. It was told that in many minor infractions he forgot about the jail, took off his coat, and gave the culprit a sound thrashing, and let it go at that. He was a remarkable man. I often think that John McClough, of Aiyansh, and Mr. Raley of Kitimat, were the two top-dog missionaries on the North Pacific Coast.

When I read of the "70-car caravan," arriving on the banks of the Old Nass River, I couldn't help thinking, that if the ghosts of all these old chaps could have risen up, and taken a look-see at this caravan-of-cars that had come across the divide, and assembled on the river bank, they sure would have had an eye-full.

One thing that struck me as missing—there should have been a kind of "Modern Moses," one to smite the old Nass, and divide the waters to let the people pass over. It would have made a deep impression.

CPR captain dies aged 85

VANCOUVER (CP) — Funeral service was held Tuesday for Capt. Perry Rogers, 85, who began working the B.C. coast 67 years ago and rose to command most of the Canadian Pacific "Princess" ships during 30 years with the CPR.

He first went to sea at the age of 18, serving on Fraser River sternwheelers and tugs. He was a deckhand on the small City of Nanaimo when he first joined the CPR.

Before retiring he was master of such vessels as the Princess Kathleen and Princess Marguerite.

COLLIORES, France (AP)—The French Army is training a group of parachutist-frogmen who can jump from 1,300 feet into the sea and swim underwater for six miles.

Their role in wartime could be sabotage actions on the open seas as well as in ports.
