Most Widely Used Money in the World

In the Sahara Desert, or along the Rhine, the world's "Number One Money" is the travelers cheque.

An American traveler in the Sahara once offered a $20 gold piece for a woven camel blanket, but was turned down suspiciously by a cautious Arab sheik. In despair, the eager traveler produced an American Express travelers cheques and the blanket was his.

A similar experience occurred to two Americans in Hong Kong who had been robbed of everything but their travelers cheques. Desperately in need of food, they hesitantly offered a $20 cheque to an ancient Chinese merchant. "Oh, yes, Number One Money," he exclaimed with a grin and business got underway.

The travelers cheque was created because — oddly enough — the then president of American Express, J. C. Fargo, had difficulty cashing his letters-of-credit while on a trip to Europe in 1890.

"If the president of American Express has this difficulty," he reasoned, "just think what ordinary travelers face. Something has got to be done about it."

What was done about it has resulted in the biggest private money business in the world today. An inventive employee of the company devised the double-signature cheque that is still in use today. The user signs it when he obtains it at his local bank. Then when he is ready to spend it, he signs it again in the presence of the person accepting it. A simple idea — but virtually foolproof. It's so foolproof that the original promise made by American Express in 1891 holds good today—any cheque lost or stolen before the second signature is written will be made good. American Express still uses the original form for the term "cheque".

Not only has American Express made the cheques hard to counterfeit, but it has backed them up with a unique, private secret service — the Inspector's Department. The service plays good Samaritan to travelers, helps the police track down forgers, foil counterfeiters and outwit confidence men.

There have been few attempts at counterfeiting the cheques which are printed on special safety paper, bear a watermark with the letters AM-EX-Co., and contain small red, blue and yellow discs, known as "planchettes", embedded in the paper.
