

ALMOST FAINTED IN THE STREET

to Daily Four 40 Death—Until "Fruit-a-lives" Brought Relief.

CHATHAM, Ont., April 3rd, 1913. Some two years ago, I was a great sufferer from indigestion. One day I caught a billboard of "Fruit-a-lives" and I said to myself "if it-a-lives will build me up like it, it is good enough for me". I bought some. After taking these wonderful tablets for only three weeks, I found myself wonderfully improved. In a short time longer, I died myself entirely. My case was light one, either, Gas would often get in my stomach and I was in daily pain that it would not around my heart and kill me. "Fruit-a-lives" is only remedy for "Indigestion".

HILLMAN'S WIFE SUES BUT RELENTS

Asks for Divorce, Then Makes Up With Broker, Who Says She Was Lonely, That's All

Los Angeles, Cal., Feb. 8.—Mrs. Clarence D. Hillman, who came to Pasadena from Seattle two years ago, today filed suit for a divorce from her husband, well known as a Seattle real estate promoter, alleging cruelty, and a few hours later announced that she had effected a reconciliation with her husband and that the suit would be withdrawn. Up to late last night, however, the suit still stands on the files of the superior court.

The Hillmans live in a palatial home in Pasadena, which Hillman purchased when he came here from Seattle, paying $250,000 cash for the property. Tonight Hillman stated that the whole affair was occasioned by his wife's nervous condition.

"I have been away several days," he said, "and had neglected her. My business just at this time is very pressing, and instead of paying my wife the attention I should have paid her I gave all my time to business affairs, and she simply became lonely and in a fit of anger filed suit. It will be withdrawn tomorrow. A divorce between us is nonsense."

WHAT BRITAIN IS NOW DOING FOR NEXT SUMMER'S CAMPAIGN

"BUSINESS AS USUAL" SLOGAN HAS BEEN MISUNDERSTOOD BY SOME OF ALLIED PEOPLE WHERE BUSINESS WAS ENTIRELY DISRUPTED

There are signs of restiveness in some quarters in France and Russia regarding Great Britain's share in the war. It is supposed that our preparations are too deliberate, and to put it bluntly, that we are not putting enough men into the field. These impressions are not shared by the French and Russian governments, nor at the Army Headquarters of our Allies, where the present position is perfectly well understood. They are merely prevalent in uninformed circles, and there is some reason to believe that they have been partly prompted by German agents. Nevertheless these things are being said, and it is very necessary to reply to them as simply and clearly as possible.

To some extent it is our own fault that these erroneous ideas have obtained currency in France and Russia. The cry of "business as usual" has done an infinity of mischief, and has been the cause of grave misunderstanding. It has always been both stupid and untrue. Business can never be "as usual" when the nation is waging the greatest struggle it has ever known, but France and Russia resent the cry because in their countries nearly all business has stopped save that of work for the war. Then another cause of misunderstanding has been the excessive noise made by all our preparations for the succor of the wounded and the relief of the distressed. Neither France nor Russia has been able to emulate our tremendous efforts in this direction, because they are dealing with vastly greater numbers. They are a little puzzled by what we do, and are inclined to say: "Are you turning all your energy to philanthropy or are you engaged in waging war?" Then they scoff rather enviously at the comforts we lavish upon our troops in the field, and think we molly-coddle them, though an hour's stroll at any point from Ypres to La Bassee would quickly dispel this illusion.

We have been depicted as stolidly and lazily preparing on the assumption that the war may be over in less than three years. Nothing can be further from the truth, for although we are willing to maintain this struggle not for three but for thirty years, our whole aim is to overthrow Germany at the earliest possible moment.

The Conscription Question

Many people in France and Russia condemn us because we have not introduced conscription. The answer to that complaint implies the answer to nearly all the other points. It is that we have enlisted all the men we can possibly train and arm and equip at the present moment, and if at the outbreak of the war we had adopted conscription and every other known expedient we should have had no more men in the fighting line today.

What have we done? We sent our small but highly efficient Expeditionary Force to France, and thereby we did all that France had ever been led to expect from us. It was a few days late, but had it been five days earlier the opening phase of the war would probably have followed exactly the same course. The retreat to the Marne was due to circumstances over which the British army had no control. We have since sent to France reinforcements far in excess of any suggestion previously made. We have a million more men (I am dealing with round figures) who will be sent to the front when they are ready. We shall raise another million or more as reserves for these new armies. The Frenchman or the Russian who talks rather at random says: "But why don't you send these

What Our New Armies Must Be

We are getting all these wants supplied and are working night and day, but it takes time. A million bayonets are by themselves of no use for the task which lies ahead. When we put our new armies into the field they must go in overwhelming strength and not in dribbles. They must have ammunition in quantities sufficient to keep on fighting all the way to the Rhine and beyond. They must have guns enough to batter away at the German defences until they have broken them down. They must be trained and disciplined, and not sent to the front quite raw. If we have had to do all this since the war began, no one in Russia and France has any ground for complaint. Our military limitations were known to all, and certainly to the French and Russian ministers and armies. It may surprise some of our critics in Paris and Petrograd to know that one hears in this country very much the same sort of thing about themselves, though never in quarters where the situation is understood. We do not jump to the ungenerous conclusion that our Allies are not doing as much as they might. The onlookers in France and Russia should regard us with a like confidence.

The course of this war is bound up in all countries with the question of military supplies. In this country we have had to face the further problem of organizing and training our men. Germany will in future be troubled more and more about supplies, while the Allies will steadily accumulate abundance of munitions of war. I think it would clear up a great deal of misconception if the government permitted our newspapers to raise the veil and reveal a glimpse of the extraordinary and almost inconceivable activity which prevails throughout this country in preparation for the summer campaign. It would also promote a better understanding if they invited parties of French and Russian journalists to see what we are doing. A few French statesmen have been here privately already, and have gone back satisfied and reassured.

I have said nothing about the work of our navy, nothing about the smaller campaigns we are waging elsewhere, nothing about the manifest and inevitable advantages we enjoy by reason of our comparative immunity from attack and our larger resources. I have simply tried to answer the inquiry, "Why don't you send more men?" Germany knows better than our friendly critics. She realizes the full significance of our efforts, and hates and denounces us in proportion.—Lovat Fraser in the London Daily Mail.
