Irish Question is Not Religious, says Mrs. Peat

Urges Suppress Lawlessness and then give Dominion Rule; Too Much Leniency in Past, says Lecturer

Declaring that the Irish question was not a religious one but that the present troubles arose from the supineness of the authorities in not enforcing the laws and thus allowing the situation to get out of hand, Louis Watson Peat, wife of Private Peat, gave a very interesting lecture at the Chautauqua gathering in the skating rink last evening. She urged Dominion rule as the solution of the present problem.

Mrs. Peat said that the words Sein Fein (pronounced Shin Fane) mean "ourselves alone." The organization was allowed to grow unheeded for many years until now it had got beyond control of either church or state. It had grown up as a result of too much leniency. Laws were not enforced and this was the result. It was "nationalism gone to seed, sentimentalism gone to the madhouse." Ireland had a bad case of swelled head and as a result she aimed to get the whole empire by the ears. Between the Sinn Fein on one side and the soldiers on the other were the loyalists.

Grievances. "Why were all the murders?" the lecturer inquired. Because of the supineness of authority. There were grievances of course. Did not everyone have grievances? There was also the ideal of self-determination of small nations. There were grievances in every country, but the difficulty with the Irish was that they looked back to 100 years ago, and lived on the memory of that time. The condition of 100 years ago or of 50 years ago were not the conditions of today.

The word "England" had been used as a slogan by every Anglophobic for years past, but all the Empire was to blame for conditions today as much as England. Ireland was the key to Imperial unity for in union lay the strength of the Empire. The speaker said she had no brief for England nor for the Welsh or Scotch. She herself, though born in Ireland, was a Canadian. She argued that authority must be exerted and if those in authority in Ireland today did not "do the job" they should get out and let someone else do it. Dominion rule was the solution of the problem. There were, however, problems to solve. There was the north and south problem, the safeguarding of minorities. De Valera who led the Sinn Fein faction (continued on Page Four.)
