PRICE OF FURS ON THIS COAST

C. H. French, Manager of Hudson's Bay Company Discusses Matter at Victoria

VICTORIA, Oct. 13—Conditions at present existing in the fur trade are notable for the absence of buyers, according to C. H. French, manager of the Hudson's Bay Company here and a specialist in the fur trade. In an interview Mr. French explained that, while prices of raw furs were still far above pre-war figures, the values attached to all grades of fur a year ago have completely collapsed and the market is now awaiting the resumption of buying by the general public before any considerable sales of raw furs can take place.

Misleading Prices

Speaking of the results accruing at a fur sale held in Seattle on October 5, Mr. French said: "Without explanations these results may cause trappers and storekeepers considerable loss. The prices quoted as being obtained by Messrs. Hibbard and Swenson were: Red fox, $20; white fox, $20; ermine, $1.50; cross fox, $35, and sable, $80. Although these figures were quite correct, they are entirely misleading, as the goods sold were of Russian origin, their value being quite different to the values of British Columbia furs.

Varying Fox Skins

"A few examples illustrate this point," said Mr. French. Red fox of central British Columbia origin are of a flat nature and light color, their value today being not more than $12 for good average skins. Skins of Cassiar and Atlin origin carry much heavier fur of finer texture and are worth about $1 for average quality.

"The furs from the Bristol Bay country are larger than those mentioned, but this is offset by having grey rumps. For dyeing purposes this class of fox is most suitable, provided the fur is heavy and of fine texture. As to the foxes originating from islands of the Pacific Ocean, these are large and very coarse and not worth more than half as much as inland skins."

Best Foxes Known

As a comparison, Mr. French said: "The Kamchatka foxes sold by Hibbard and Swenson, although perhaps a trifle small in size, are perhaps the finest produced in any part of the world, carrying a deep rich red color, with a great wealth of rich silky fur. Therefore, while the quotation of $20 for the Hibbard and Swenson skins was correct, it does not mean that British Columbia skins are worth this, but rather that the very most our dealers can expect to realize is $15. I may add that, out of perhaps 5,000 skins offered at that sale, only about 500 were sold, showing that the trade is not able to absorb all offered, and therefore it is only reasonable to look for a further decline."

Vagaries of Furs

Speaking of the market for marten, a line of much interest to British Columbia fur dealers, Mr. French said that these skins had a pre-war value of about $5 for average quality and retained this price through the two low priced years which followed. Last year they rose in value until they touched $50 apiece and are now worth about $15 or $20 each. "We often see these quoted at so much per skin, without any mention of the location whence they came," said Mr. French. "Almost every hundred miles of our vast country produces a different class of fur and there are distinct values placed by buyers on this fact, ranging in the following order: Cassiar and Atlin, Upper Yukon, Lower Yukon, Central British Columbia, Cascade, Coast and Island. Each of these contains subdivisions that are made when close values are necessary, and, in addition, each section carries different values depending on the color."

Mr. French cited in point Cassiar marten, a lot from this district carrying good color might sell for an average of $30 each, while skins from the same section, but carrying less color would be sold for about $15 apiece.
