SENSATIONAL MURDER CASE STIRS ENGLAND

Trial of South Wales Lawyer is Followed by Whole Country with Interest

SUSPICIONS ARE QUITE GROUNDLESS

Man Married Again Within Three Months of Wife's Death and Arsenic is Found

A poison trial of extraordinary interest came to an end at Carmarthen when Harold Greenwood, a South Wales solicitor was acquitted on a charge of murdering his first wife. For over a week the progress of the case was watched by the country with the closest attention and every daily newspaper devoted columns of space to the presentation of the evidence and to descriptions of the exciting scenes both inside and outside the court.

The trial merely served to deepen the mystery of Mrs. Greenwood's death. No one was able to show how arsenic found its way into her body, and there was even room for doubt that the poison was the ultimate cause of death. The defence propounded a multitude of theories to account for the presence of a substantial amount of arsenic, and the Crown made a remarkable attempt to advance a fresh hypothesis at the last moment when they discovered that the main prop of their case had broken down.

Local Gossip

To understand the position as it was submitted to the judgment of a jury, it will be necessary to trace events leading up to the trial in their natural order.

The Greenwoods — husband, wife and four children — lived in an imposing house in Kidwell, on the Bristol Channel, too small to be called a town, but big enough to resent the name of a village. It was self-contained enough, however, to enjoy a good gossip and to interest itself actively in the affairs of its social hierarchy the Greenwoods, the vicar and the doctor.

Everyone agreed that during the twenty-three years of their married life the Greenwoods were on affectionate terms, and that though Mrs. Greenwood was a trifle jealous of her husband's friendship with Miss Griffith, the doctor's sister over the way, that jealousy did not disturb the harmony of the household. Mrs. Greenwood was a gentlewoman, given to charity and good works, and with her private income of £900 a year she assisted in the maintenance of the home. She was in delicate health, had a weak heart which rendered her liable to fainting turns and had a fibrous tumor which occasionally set up haemorrhage.

On Sunday, June 15, 1919, the family sat down to a lunch of roast lamb, gooseberry pie and custard. Wine was placed upon the table and, as was her habit, Mrs. Greenwood partook of it. Later in the day she became ill and complained that the gooseberry pie, which sometimes disagreed with her, had upset her again. There was vomiting and diarrhoea, and at three o'clock the following morning she died, with her husband (who was weeping), her elder daughter, Irene, the doctor and the district nurse by her bedside. The doctor gave a certificate that death was due to valvular disease of the heart.

The Weed-Killer Story

On September 24, 1919, Mr. Greenwood obtained a marriage licence and a week later he was married to a Miss Glways Jones. That was the signal for the storm clouds of suspicion to gather round Rumsey House. The custom requiring a man to pay homage to his wife's memory by remaining a widower for at least six months had been broken and this bit of gossip was turned over and over on the tongues of the villagers until it grew into something sinister.

A whisper went round that Mr. Greenwood — he was plain "Greenwood" now — had at one time or another had in his possession great quantities of weed-killer, a deadly poison, one pinch of which on a threepenny-bit would hold enough arsenic to kill a full-grown man. Then it was recalled that the symptoms of Mrs. Greenwood's illness were consistent, not only with acute indigestion, but with arsenical poisoning. It was but a step from that to concluding that murder had been committed and the motive was there ready-made. Even before his second marriage Mr. Greenwood had been dressed up by the village gossip as an elderly flirt and his name had been coupled with the names of the doctor's sister, the district nurse, an intimate friend of his late wife and two women whom he had never before heard of.

The police began to sift the rumors and very soon it was evident that they suspected the husband.

Mr. Greenwood's answer to the charge made against him was in one sentence: "I did not do this thing." That was his attitude from beginning to end.

The Inquest

In April of the following year Mrs. Greenwood's body was exhumed and a quarter of a grain of arsenic was found in her viscera. From this the Crown experts inferred that there must have been at least two grains in the body before death. An inquest was held in the village hall opposite Mrs. Greenwood's opened grave, only two hundred yards away from Rumsey House. On the second day of the inquest, June 16, 1920 (the first anniversary of Mrs. Greenwood's death) the coroner's jury returned a verdict of murder against Harold Greenwood, who was at once arrested. The jury, acting mainly upon the evidence of the parlor-maid, were of the opinion that the wine taken at luncheon had been used as a medium for administering the weedkiller. At the magisterial hearing which followed, the family doctor said he had given his patient two morphia pills on the night of her illness. That statement was carefully noted by the defence.

The accused man lay in Carmarthen gaol for four months awaiting his trial at the Winter Assizes before Mr. Justice Rhearman and a jury. His second wife stayed on at Rumsey House with her stepchildren and paid almost daily visits to her husband.
